HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, we entreat Thee to meet with us, transforming and ennobling our aspirations, our thoughts, and our endeavors. We thank Thee for our spiritual privileges and pray that we may have a fuller appreciation of our indebtedness to Thee. Grant us in the utmost simplicity and childlike confidence to consecrate our time to Thee and our homeland. Thou art our hiding place; Thou shalt preserve us from trouble; Thou shalt compass us about with songs of deliverance. Do Thou hear our prayer for all those in sorrow; for those who have been forsaken of the best and the dearest; for those who have been evilly treated; for the poor who are struggling with poverty and the winter's blast; and for those whose hearts have been invaded by tragedy and cannot tell the world their thoughts. O Thou who art sufficient for all things, be pleased to hear us. In our Saviour's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

On January 25, 1940:

H. R. 7171. An act to amend section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

On January 26, 1940:

H. R. 2953. An act authorizing States owning lands or interests therein acquired from the United States to include the same in certain agreements for the conservation of oil and gas resources; and

H. R. 3931. An act for the relief of Charles H. LeGay.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. St. Claire, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7805) entitled "An act making supplemental appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, Coast Guard, and Federal Bureau of Investigation, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ADAMS, Mr. GLASS, Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1036) entitled "An act to authorize the purchase of certain lands adjacent to the Turtle Mountain Indian Agency in the State of North Dakota," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. WHEELER, and Mr. FRAZIER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include a very able and splendid statement of Hon. Edward O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, at a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee on January 25, 1940.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD in four instances: (1) A tribute to the late Representative William I. Sirovich; (2) the foreign-trade zone at New York; (3) on the subject Recovery, Not Higher Taxes; and (4) on loan to Finland.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to address this body last Wednesday, January 24, on the subject of the destruction of human life in Poland. You will find that address on page 621. Today, I have introduced a resolution, House Resolution 369, which has been referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee, and I hope that the committee will give it an early hearing and favorable consideration. I also trust that Congress will adopt this resolution since I feel that as a Government which was instrumental in the creation of the Polish state in the year 1918 it is our duty to express our sympathy with the suffering and unfortunate people of that state. Without burdening this House with any further statements I want to call the Members' attention to a press release of the New York Times of January 29, 1940, which gives a very clear picture of the happenings in Poland.

MASS SHOOTINGS IN POLAND LAID TO NAZIS BY CARDINAL—MEMORANDUM, PRESENTED TO POPE, ACCUSES GERMANS OF BREAKING UP FAMILIES AND JAILING "SCORES OF THOUSANDS"

(By Camille M. Clafarra)

ROME, January 28.—Details of mass shootings, man hunts by German Gestapo (secret police) agents, plundering and persecutions conducted with cold-blooded brutality and ferocity are contained in a memorandum published today describing what is held to be the situation of the Catholic Church and of the Polish people in the archdioceses of Gniezno and Poznan.

The memorandum, which is authorized by August Cardinal Hlond, Primate of Poland, was presented to the Pope last week. On it the Vatican based several of its recent broadcasts of Polish atrocities in German-occupied Poland. The 11,000-word document contains seven reports covering conditions up to the 30th of December 1939.

It charges Germany with deliberately wanting to destroy the Catholic religion and depopulating of all Polish nationals in the territories of Pomerania, Poznan, and Silesia, which she has annexed. To carry out this policy, the memorandum says, the Germans have closed the churches in several districts and are deporting Poles from every walk of life, be they of the nobility or of the lower classes, to concentration camps in Germany.

They are sending young Polish boys and girls still in their teens to Germany, it is asserted, in order to imbue them with Nazi ideals. Older persons are herded into railroad cars and dumped after several days' journey in towns within the area called "Government General Poland," where they are kept in unsanitary overcrowded barracks and where they sleep on vermin-ridden straw mats.

Families are broken up, it is charged, the father usually being deported to a concentration camp, the mother abandoned to her fate with no money or belongings, and the children, if they have survived the hardships, sent to Germany.

The memorandum makes clear that inasmuch as the forced Polish emigration from the German-annexed districts must end by April 1, millions of Poles are expected to be packed into the Gouvernement General territory in a few weeks. They will be completely destitute and therefore, the document says, famine and decimation by epidemics are expected.

"It will be a true extermination, conceived with diabolical cunning and carried out with unequalled cruelty," says the memorandum, which then appeals for Red Cross aid and foreign relief commissions in Gouvernement Poland, where it stresses "the last act of the unbelievable tragedy is about to take place." Many of those sent there, it adds, will die of hunger in the spring.

The number of Poles shot up to December 30 runs into several thousands and those jailed into scores of thousands, according to one of the reports.

"The Polish population is barbarously persecuted," it says. "The number of people shot runs into several thousands, those in jail number scores of thousands. In the jails appalling things take place. At Bydgoszcz, for instance, prisoners were forced to lie full length with their faces on the ice-cold stone floor, beaten till they were unconscious, and threatened continuously with death.

YOUTHS SENT TO REICH

"Raids are being carried out to get hold of the youth, which is exported to Germany.

"There are at present mass deportations of Poles to the Gouvernement General Poland, and in this case the victims lose all they own—land, houses, furniture, shops, clothes, lingerie, and money. People are suddenly turned into beggars. Thus deprived of every possession, they are sent to the central areas, where there is already a dearth of every commodity. In the spring many of them will die of hunger."

The Germans, says another report, are "trampling on every liberty of conscience and religious right of the population.

"They are suppressing the faith in these lands which have defended it since the days of Bismarck," it goes on. "After having incorporated the dioceses of Poznan and Gniezno, the Germans began the extermination of the Polish element foreshadowed by Hitler in Mein Kampf, which formed the basis of the aggression against Poland. Without taking into account public and secret shootings, without describing the horrors which are being committed in the prisons and concentration camps, we must describe one of the greatest iniquities of all history, namely, the violent expulsions of people from these dioceses."

After explaining that the victims are left destitute and that "even their money is stolen," the memorandum describes how the Gestapo agents raid houses during the night and seize between 500 and 1,500 people at a time.

"In Poznan," says the report describing one of these raids, "the expulsion of the Poles from their homes takes place under heart-breaking conditions. At 9:30 p. m. the lights in the houses and in the streets are turned off and then the hunt for the Poles begins, with the result that 500 or more are seized. These poor people cannot sleep and remain in darkened rooms near the window, waiting their turn.

DRESS IN WARM CLOTHES

"They dress themselves in their warmest clothes, so as not to die from cold in a concentration camp, because they generally are not allowed to take anything except what they have on. Sometimes a more humane agent allows them to take some few extra woolen clothes. But they must leave their home with what they are wearing; if they are not ready they are taken away in their night clothes. No one is allowed to visit those who are in the concentration camps; no one can bring food to them."

The victims, explains the memorandum, are grouped in the streets, where, covered by the rifles of the Gestapo agents, they wait for a bus which sometimes is delayed for hours.

"This winter," says the document, "with 15 degrees below zero and sometimes more, it happened that these poor people—women, children, the aged, and infirm—were obliged to stand on a public street for 4 hours, the stillness of the gelid night broken by lamentations and sobs. All those seized are taken from Poznan to the concentration camp in the Glowna suburbs. This camp is unheated, has a cement floor and not a single mattress.

"People sleep for weeks on the same stinking, vermin-ridden straw. There are no sanitary facilities or hot water. Attention is paid to no one, not even to those who are dying from illness or to the aged, the children, and to mothers in the pangs of childbirth.

"The babies born in these large barns are, for lack of warm water, washed with tepid coffee contributed by some generous souls. Illness and mortality have reached a high percentage, but doctors and priests are not allowed unless they happen to be among the victims."

In describing the condition of the Catholic clergy, the memorandum says that the Gestapo is "especially persecuting the clergy." The Germans, it adds, shot 15 priests in the archdiocese of Gniezno, whose names are listed in the report.

Several of the churches have been taken over by the Germans, who are turning them to various uses. The church at Bydgoszcz, says the memorandum, was occupied by the police, who held in it "indecent orgies." Scores of priests, it adds, are in jail, while almost all Catholic institutions in the archdioceses of Poznan and Gniezno have been seized.

FIFTEEN PRIESTS REPORTED KILLED

ROME, January 28.—Sensational allegations of the widespread murder and persecution of Catholic priests in Poland by the German Gestapo (secret police) and soldiers are contained in documents prepared for Pope Pius XII, it was revealed today by Polish sources at the Vatican.

The detailed documents were said to bear the authorization of August Cardinal Hlond, primate of Poland, and list with names and dates at least 15 priests alleged to have been killed by shooting, beating, and ill-treatment at the hands of the Germans.

Not only priests but nuns have been subjected to this persecution and humiliation, the report alleges, and children have been turned out of Catholic orphanages.

"Dozens of priests have been imprisoned and are being humiliated, beaten, and maltreated," the report says. "Certain numbers have been deported to Germany and no news of them has been received. Others are kept in concentration camps.

"It is not rare to see priests among workmen in the country fixing roads, repairing bridges, pulling coal carts, working in factories, and even demolishing synagogues.

"Some priests were closed in a pigsty at night, beaten barbarously, and subjected to tortures."

LXXXVI—49

At Gniezno, it was said, a Catholic convent has been seized by the Germans to hold imprisoned Jews and the convent fathers turned out.

"The principal church in the parish of the Holy Trinity has been profaned, the parish house invaded, and its funds stolen," it was said.

"In the archdiocese of Gniezno the German authorities, especially the Gestapo, persecute the Catholic clergy, which is terrorized and continually threatened with more such treatment without the possibility of defending itself."

German soldiers were alleged to have killed Father Mariano Skazpeczak, vicar of Plonkowo, by beating him on the head with rifle butts. While doing forced labor, Father Guiseppe Domeracki, parish priest of Gromadno, died and Father Leone Brezczewski, parish priest of Sosnicka, was killed by a German bomb, the report added.

Father Boleslaw Jasknowski, parish priest of Inowroclaw, and Father Romaldo Soltysinski, parish priest of Rzaikwin, were said to have died as result of ill-treatment.

SOME GERMANS AID POLES—MONEY FOUND IN DAMAGED WARSAW CHURCHES—GIVEN BY CATHOLICS

PARIS, January 28.—Many Germans in occupied Poland appear to be conscience-stricken by the country's devastation and the sufferings inflicted on the Polish people. In collection boxes in several damaged churches in Warsaw German coins and banknotes are found frequently—obviously conscience money of devout German Catholic soldiers and officials.

Fugitives from Nazi war camps relate that German officers and privates sometimes helped prisoners escape across the frontier into neighboring neutral countries. In some cases these Germans ask for a little "certificate" of their decency and sympathy—a statement signed by the fugitive Pole that he was assisted by the German.

One soldier, an Austrian, explained that he was asking for this insurance policy "testifying to services rendered the Polish people" because "I may need this note to save my life if we lose the war."

When Gestapo agents are not about, German soldiers assure the Poles that they did not want war with Poland and that they bombed Warsaw under compulsion. They express regrets that so much damage was inflicted on the Polish capital. Officers anxiously inquire how the Germans were treated at the end of the last war when they evacuated Poland.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to criticize the German Government or the people who seem to be satisfied to live under that form of government. That is their own affair. However, when the German Government is responsible for the wholesale slaughter of another people, as is now taking place in Poland, I deem it my duty as a Member of the legislative body of a great democracy to cry out against such a crime and to focus the attention of the American people and the world as a whole upon the wanton destruction of an innocent people. To substantiate my statements I want to insert here some releases taken from the Jewish Telegraphic Agency:

NAZIS DEFER LODZ EXPULSION ON PAYMENT OF 9,000,000 ZLOTYS

GENEVA, January 26.—The Jews of Lodz, Nazi Poland, have been forced to pay a ransom of 9,000,000 zlotys ($1,800,000 at pre-war rates) to secure postponement to the spring of an expulsion order it was reliably learned here today.

The expulsion order affected 50,000 Jews concentrated in a number of streets. It was intended by the Nazi authorities as the first step toward realization of a program completely to "de-Judaize" the largest Polish city annexed by the Reich.

Monday the Vatican radio broadcast the first of a series of three descriptions of excesses in Poland. Apparently with papal approval, the announcer declared the Nazi atrocities affronted the "moral conscience of mankind" and cited the "unimpeachable testimony of eyewitnesses to the horrors and inexcusable excesses committed upon a helpless and homeless people." (J. T. A. News, January 24.)

These events were indicative of mounting reaction to German brutality in occupied Poland. But the brutality continued, evidenced in such occurrences as:

Expulsion: Some 1,900 Jews were slain in a 4-day enforced march of several thousands to the border of Soviet Poland. Jews were rounded up in Chelm and Hrubieszow and driven toward the border. According to details reaching Geneva, "Those falling from exhaustion were shot dead on the spot. Although the frontier was only 4 kilometers distant (from Hrubieszow), the Nazis took the Jews by a roundabout route covering more than 50 kilometers, chasing them across fields, woods, and marshes * * *. Every few minutes the Nazis ordered those who were tired to stand aside. These were shot dead and their bodies left lying in the fields. During the march the Jews were not given food or drink, and those trying to leave formation to take water from ditches were shot dead.

"At the Sokal bridge survivors were told that anyone failing to cross the river, either over the bridge or by swimming, within 20 minutes would be shot. On reaching the Soviet side the Jews, despite desperate resistance, were taken across the frontier by the Soviet guards and turned over to the Germans. They were told they would be shot unless they crossed the river again. A number swam across and succeeded in entering Soviet territory." (J. T. A. News, January 22.)

Executions: Extracts from Nazi police diaries, published in the Breslau newspaper, Schlesische Zeitung, gave further details of treatment of Jews. The Germans, entering the town of Lask, shot 100 Jews in searching the town. When a Jewish crowd allegedly tried to prevent the Germans from entering a synagogue, police used their guns and killed several hundred, razing the synagogue. In Sieradz 35 Jews were executed. In Radom 3,600 Jews were arrested and interned in a concentration camp and more than 100 were executed for "resisting" the Nazi police. The diaries said the task of the police was "facilitated" by many suicides of Jews to avoid arrest. (J. T. A. News, January 23.)

Blackmail: The Jews of Lodz have been forced to pay a "ransom" of 9,000,000 zlotys ($1,800,000 at pre-war rates) to secure postponement until spring of an expulsion order affecting 50,000 Jews concentrated in a number of streets. The Jews were already preparing to leave the city, many being on their way out, when the order was temporarily suspended after the community had paid the "ransom." (J. T. A. News, January 25.)

RELIEF EFFORTS OBSTRUCTED

The American Red Cross some time ago reached an agreement with the German Government containing Nazi assurances of non-sectarian distribution of Red Cross supplies in Nazi Poland and permission for periodic American supervision. The American Friends' Service Committee has been holding out for continuous American supervision. This week the Red Cross decided also to seek continuous supervision and threatened to withdraw relief offers unless it obtained a supplementary agreement with the Germans.

Red Cross: It was learned in Washington that the German authorities have refused to allow James T. Nicholson, Red Cross representative, to enter Poland for anything more than a brief visit. Some supplies sent from America arrived in Cracow and were distributed without supervision, while Nicholson was blocked in his attempts to reach Cracow. The Red Cross said negotiations for a supplementary agreement were still in progress, and without it no further supplies would be sent to Poland. (J. T. A. News, January 26.)

The Belgian Red Cross reportedly had better results in arranging shipments to Poland. It sent a transport of food, medical supplies, and underclothing to Warsaw via Berlin to be distributed under supervision of Belgian Legation officials with provision made to insure that at least one-third of the supplies go to the Jews of Warsaw. (J. T. A. News, January 22.)

I hope and pray that the protest by the President of the United States, if and when my resolution will be adopted, will awaken the conscience of the civilized world and unite all nations in the denunciation of the Nazi terror in stricken Poland.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therewith a letter to the editor of the Washington Evening Star by my colleague the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DARDEN] on the subject of the naval-construction program.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a summary and report issued by the Federal Works Agency, the Work Projects Administration, Division of Research.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter and financial debt statement I have received from the assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to the foreign obligations owed the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 8, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT F. RICH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RICH: In reply to your letter of January 3, 1940, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, there is enclosed a statement showing the outstanding indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States as of December 15, 1939, following payments made on December 13 and December 15, 1939, by the Governments of Hungary and Finland. This is the latest statement published on the subject, and no payments have been received from any of the debtor governments since that date.

You may also be interested in the enclosed copy of a memorandum revised March 1, 1939, covering the indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States.

Very truly yours,

D. W. BELL
Assistant to the Secretary.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have you and Members of Congress look at this statement showing the amount of indebtedness owed us by foreign countries.

If you were to sit in the meetings of the House Committee on Appropriations now, you could see the fine results we are accomplishing in trying to cut down the extravagant expenditures of the Government. It is what I have been insisting on doing for 7 years, and I wish to congratulate the majority party on seeing the light of day in this respect, and I am sure you will be doing the right thing if you keep it up. Do not stop it until we balance the Budget. I think we now have an opportunity to go to these foreign nations that owe us great sums of money and ask them to pay their indebtedness to the United States. We should insist on it. The money is due us, and we should receive some consideration in payment of their debts. That is one place where we can get the money. Furthermore, if they are unable to pay us in cash, there is certainly some other way in which they could meet these obligations. For instance, there are some islands that are in close proximity to America that might be turned over as a consideration on the debt. If they would do this, they would be showing their good faith in trying to eliminate these debts to America. We do not propose to cancel them, and they might just as well know it. We are going to insist on payments; and if they are honest, honorable nations, they will make some suggestions on the payments. They can offer some of the West Indies or Bermuda or other land in close proximity to the United States. We do not want any country or territory far from our shores. Look at the above table of debts—they owe us over $12,000,000,000. France, Great Britain, Italy, Belgium, Germany, what will you offer; name your price. You come to us with an offer. It is up to you. We are waiting for your proposals.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address over the radio by Mr. Elliot Roosevelt entitled "America Looks Ahead."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART] may have permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from Clarence Austin Castle.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE GROWTH OF BLUEGRASS

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I inserted in the RECORD a news release put out by the extension service of the Ohio State University which brought out the fact that Mr. Albert B. Gatch, who lives at Milford, Ohio, was living on the same farm that his ancestors purchased from the Government in 1799. In my remarks I sought to stress the fact that this was a very unique situation, and I sought further to stress the fact that some of his land had been in blue grass for well over 100 years and had never been plowed. Many of the farmers in the limestone section of Ohio and other parts of the country will be interested and I hope might benefit from the reading of this article.

I am glad to know that my distinguished friend and colleague from New York, the Honorable JAMES W. WADSWORTH, noticed what I said, and he has evinced a very lively interest in it. His interest is set forth beautifully in a letter which I have received from him and which I am inserting in the RECORD at this point. I hope that others in the country who might read what I have said and what Senator WADSWORTH says will be interested and benefited. There is no question but that billions of dollars worth of soil and fertility have been wasted in our country.

This is the letter from the gentleman from New York, Senator WADSWORTH:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1940.

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR TOM: I have just read that statement which you inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a few days ago relating to a piece of land in your district in Ohio which has never been plowed and which is still producing a fine bluegrass pasture. This is the kind of thing I like to hear about, for, believe me, I know what such a piece of land means. I gather that the first settlers in your part of Ohio arrived at about the time that the first settlers came into the Genesee Valley in western New York—1790. My great-grandfather acquired some Genesee Valley land in 1790, and I am running some of his farms today. Believe it or not, there are tracts on those farms which have never been plowed. They are upland tracts, originally covered with timber. The timber was taken off, I suppose, about 1800 or thereabouts, and from all our records it is apparent that a natural bluegrass sod established itself immediately. It is there now, just as good as ever. We run steers and dairy cattle and sheep on it, careful never to overstock. It has withstood droughts and deluges. There is no sign of erosion. I said the timber had been taken off. I should qualify that statement. Here and there a walnut tree was left for shade and for beauty. A lot of them are still there. Ours is a limestone country. It grows grass and bone. The water is hard. It deposits a coating of lime on the inside of the kettle on the kitchen stove. Women do not like it when they come to wash their hair. But after all, we can't have everything in this world. The truth is these bluegrass limestone country tracts are God's gift to the farmer, and provided the farmer does not abuse them they will nourish him for all time. And by the way, I notice in your statement that the tract of land that you know about in Ohio is still owned by a direct descendant of the original settler. This reminds me of an old adage which persists where I live. It runs: "The best thing for the land is the foot of the owner."

Faithfully yours,

J. W. WADSWORTH.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, January 31, after the close of all legislative business and any other special orders, my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and disposition of the legislative business on Monday next, I may be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes on Thomas A. Edison.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I regretfully have to announce that my colleague from California, the Honorable ALFRED J. ELLIOTT, is seriously ill at his hotel and will not be able to attend the session. I hope he will have a speedy recovery. He is very, very ill.

HEALTH AND WELFARE ACTIVITIES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 604)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States which was read by the Clerk and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my special message to the Congress on January 23, 1939, I expressed my concern over the inequalities that exist among the States as to health services and resources with which to furnish such services. With that message I transmitted the report and recommendations on national health prepared by the Interdepartmental Committee to Coordinate Health and Welfare Activities and recommended it for careful study by the Congress.

Conditions described a year ago are substantially unchanged today. There is still need for the Federal Government to participate in strengthening and increasing the health security of the Nation. Therefore I am glad to know that a committee of the Congress has already begun a careful study of health legislation. It is my hope that such study will be continued actively during the present session, looking toward constructive action at the next. I have asked the Interdepartmental Committee to Coordinate Health and Welfare Activities to continue its studies.

In order that at least a beginning may be made I now propose for the consideration of the Congress a program for the construction of small hospitals in needy areas of the country, especially in rural areas, not now provided with them. Hospitals are essential to physicians in giving modern medical service to the people. In many areas present hospital facilities are almost nonexistent. The most elementary health needs are not being met.

The provision of hospitals in the areas to which I refer will greatly improve existing health services, attract competent doctors, and raise the standards of medical care in these communities. The new hospitals should serve the additional purpose of providing laboratory and other diagnostic facilities for the use of local physicians, as well as accommodations for local health departments.

The proposed hospitals should be built only where they are most needed; they should not be constructed in communities where public or private institutions are already available to the people in need of service even if these institutions are not up to the highest standards. To insure proper location and good standards of operation, approval of hospital construction projects should be given by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, with the advice of an advisory council consisting of outstanding medical and scientific authorities who are expert in matters relating to hospital and other public-health services.

Projects proposed for consideration should be submitted by responsible public authorities and should include assurance that adequate maintenance will be provided. Approval of projects should be preceded by careful survey of existing local hospital facilities and needs. Standards for organization, staff, and continuing operation should be established by the Surgeon General, with the advice of the advisory council. A competent hospital staff and satisfactory standards of service should be required, including medical, surgical, and maternity service. When indicated, special provisions should be made for the care of the tuberculous. In many areas of the South the present acute needs for the care of Negro patients should also be met.

I suggest that these hospitals be simple, functional structures, utilizing inexpensive materials and construction methods. The facilities of the Federal Works Agency should be utilized in the planning and execution of the hospital projects. Title to these institutions should be held by the Federal Government, but operation should be a local financial responsibility.

I recommend to the Congress that enabling legislation for this program be enacted and that a sum of between $7,500,000 and $10,000,000 be appropriated to the Public Health Service to inaugurate the program during the next fiscal year.

I am confident that even this limited undertaking will bring substantial returns in the saving of lives, rehabilitation of workers, and increased health and vigor of the people.

This suggestion is not a renewal of a public-works program through the method of grants-in-aid. The areas which I have in mind are areas so poor that they cannot raise their share of the cost of building and equipping a hospital. Yet I believe that many of such communities have enough public-spirited citizens with means, and enough citizens able to pay something for hospital treatment, to care for operating costs of a hospital, provided they do not have to pay for its original construction and equipment, or to pay annual interest and amortization on borrowed money. Treatment in such a hospital would, of course, be available to men, women, and children who literally can afford to contribute little or nothing toward their treatment.

One of the important difficulties in such areas at the present time is that young doctors hesitate to practice general medicine or surgery because of the utter lack of hospital or laboratory facilities. One cannot blame them.

In such areas also costs of construction are generally low and many local materials can be used. It is my belief that with the assistance of the Work Projects Administration the cost of building and equipping a hundred-bed hospital can be kept down to between $150,000 and $200,000. This means that we could build 50 such hospitals for between $7,500,000 and $10,000,000.

This is not an ambitious project. This principle should not be extended to Government gifts to communities which are financially able to build their own hospitals. It is an experiment in the sense that the Nation will gain much experience by undertaking such a project.

At the very least it will save lives and improve health in those parts of the Nation which need this most and can afford it least.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 30, 1940.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. CANNON of Missouri, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 8202, Rept. No. 1540) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. DIRKSEN reserved all points of order against the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and, pending that, I would like to arrange for control and division of the time with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] for general debate. I wonder if it would be agreeable for us to continue general debate throughout the day, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and one-half by me.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That will be agreeable, to run for the balance of the day, the time to be equally divided.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue through the day, one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and one-half by me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, with Mr. COLE of Maryland in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this morning, in this high hour of lethargy and complacency, I raise my voice as a Jeremiah crying in the streets of the city—warning against the evils of an inevitable day of reckoning and the certainty of the wrath to come.

We are in the midst of a great war—a war in which America is not a participant and will not be a participant, but which is affecting the United States to a degree second only to its influence on the belligerents themselves.

We have seen wars come and go. We know only too well the economic aftermath of war. Within the memory of every man within this Chamber a great war closed in 1918, and we saw for ourselves and can testify out of our own experience its effect upon our country and our people—and especially upon American agriculture and the American farmer. When the World War closed, agricultural prices, union wage scales, and industrial dividends were at the peak. Everyone was prosperous, everyone was employed, everyone had bread and to spare. And then, almost overnight, agricultural prices collapsed. The farmers of the United States saw two-thirds of their land values melt away. Prices of farm products went down to the incredible level of 10 percent of what they had been. Farms were sold under the hammer in every community until there was no longer anyone to bid on them, and the relative standard of living on the American farm fell to the lowest point in the history of the Nation.

Today, while another war rages, we are drifting heedlessly toward the same catastrophe. We know that eventually the war must end and that when it does end farm prices must drop as before. The war cannot last indefinitely. It may close within the year. With that certainty before us, with the experiences of 1920 still fresh in mind, what is being done—what steps are being taken—to protect the farmers of the United States against a recurrence of the bankruptcies, foreclosures, privation, and suicides that followed the last war? Or must we go through all that again? Is Congress so impotent and the Committee on Agriculture so indifferent that it will not even invite counsel, or call witnesses, or hold hearings, or give the matter any formal consideration whatsoever? Legislation of this character cannot be drafted in a day. Even after enactment, laws of such far-reaching effect require months to reach maximum operating efficiency. If the war closes within the next year, as is generally expected, means and methods must be devised and adopted at this session of Congress if they are to prove effective. The next session will be too late. Even if the war drags out over a period of years—which seems unlikely—it is not too early to begin to formulate a law to cope with the situation which is certain to follow the close of hostilities. It will be too late to build a cyclone cellar after the cyclone starts. This session convened practically a month ago. It must adjourn for the national conventions in June. And yet up to this time no steps have been taken, so far as the Congress is apprized, to even inquire into the possibilities of saving the farmer and the country from the chaos which must inevitably follow. The end of the war can already be foreseen. No one who lived through 1920 can entertain the slightest misapprehension as to the effect the close of the war will have on farm prices. Someone is asleep at the switch or else is criminally negligent. Either the Committee on Agriculture does not want to avoid national disaster, already looming directly ahead, or it is deaf, dumb, and blind.

Now, let no one say I have minimized or deprecated the benefits to agriculture accruing from the Agricultural Adjustment Act, soil conservation, parity payments, the purchase of surplus commodities, and every other recourse available the last 4 years. Every agricultural appropriation bill I have reported to the House since they became operative has utilized them to capacity. This subcommittee has reported the maximum authorizations for all of them, and the last agricultural appropriation bill was the only appropriation bill of the session reported out in excess of the Budget estimates. Every dollar that could be secured was reported out by this committee in a futile effort to solve the farm problem. Without these inadequate windfalls the lot of the farmer would have been unendurable. But the fact remains that they have not solved the problem and have failed by a wide margin to bring farm prices or the farm income up to parity or near parity.

So frightful were the effects from the collapse of farm prices in 1920, and so widespread the national wreckage which attended it, that every political party in each quadrennial convention from 1928 to 1936 has included in its platform a solemn pledge to restore farm prices to equity. Congress by legislative enactments in 1933 and again in 1938 formally recognized the need and justice of parity prices for farm products and committed itself to the policy of restoring agriculture to a plane of economic equality with labor and industry. So far these piecemeal stopgaps are our only effort to redeem our promise to the American farmer to pay him as fair a price for what he sells as he must pay for what he buys. They have had a fair and exhaustive trial. And we must now face the fact that they do not redeem the campaign promises or platform pledges of either party. The Secretary of Agriculture testified emphatically at the hearings before the committee that the law as it now stands will not, and cannot, bring farm prices up to parity, and that additional legislation is necessary if we ever hope under normal conditions to give the farmer a fair price for his products and a decent wage for his labor. In corroboration of his testimony, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics submits the following table:

Prices received by farmers for specified commodities on Nov. 15, 1919 and 1939, and parity price Nov. 15, 1939

In the last column is the price we promised the farmer. And in the middle column is the price we are actually paying him. Here are the figures. They speak for themselves. They give you the high-water level to which the combined legislative and administrative measures adopted up to this time have been able to force farm prices.

It is true, as Secretary Wallace testified, that without these measures corn would be selling today for less than 20 cents, cotton close to 5 cents, wheat at 30 cents, hogs around $3, and other farm products in proportion. But the important thing is that with all these benefits, supplemented by drought and war, and billions of dollars of relief expenditures, the farmer is still one-fourth short of what he earned and what we promised him. Can you imagine organized labor opening its envelope on pay day and finding its wages 25 percent short? And can you imagine what the Committee on Labor would do about it? While the farmer has been collecting from half to three-fourths of his pay—and the Committee on Agriculture has for 4 years refused to consider a bill to pay him in full—legislation reported out by the Committee on Labor has been so effective that union wage scales and earnings per week are more than 50 percent above parity, as is shown in the accompanying table submitted to the committee by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics and based on data compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics:

Weekly earnings in building and construction, and of factory workers, 1913, 1919, and 1939

² Computed by multiplying weekly earnings in building and construction on May 15, 1913, by the index of the cost of living for June 1919 of 171.1 and for June 1939 of 142.5 (1913=100) compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

³ Not available.

⁴ Average for the years 1914 (1913 not available) and 1919 estimated by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

⁵ Computed by multiplying weekly earnings in 1914 by the index of the cost of living for June 1919 of 168.7 and for June 1939 of 140.4 (1914=100).

In the last column is the wage the workman would earn if he received parity, and in the middle column is the wage we are actually paying him. Agriculture is getting less than 25 percent under parity and labor is getting more than 50 percent over parity.

Industry likewise is above parity. This morning's newspapers announce that the first 100 corporations to report their 1939 earnings show total profits 67 percent larger than in 1938. Twenty-one railroads show an increase in total profits of more than 1,000 percent. The Du Pont Co. more than doubled its profits. The Bell Telephone Co. reported the largest profits made in any year since the telephone was invented. Sixty-six miscellaneous industrial enterprises earned $221,804,000, as against $102,777,000 the year before; and the United States Savings and Loan League, supported by urban incomes, reports the highest totals in 9 years.

In comparison with these increases, the Department of Agriculture reports in Crops and Markets that the average price of the farmer's hogs declined from $7.25 in 1938 to $5.87 in 1939, while the cost of building materials for his barns increased 7.5 percent in 2 months. Eggs dropped from 27.9 cents a dozen for 1938 to 20.5 cents for 1939, while Pennsylvania oil for his incubator and tractor advanced six times during the year 1939. Wheat has fallen 12 cents since January 1, while the price of the superphosphate to grow the wheat advanced in the same time from $7.50 to $8.50 per ton. And the farmer's share of the national income was the lowest in 5 years, as indicated in the following table supplied by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics:

The second column shows the total national income for the United States, and the last column shows the percent of the national income paid to the farmer. It shows that the farmers, who constitute 25 percent of the Nation's population, are receiving less than 7 percent of the national income. And it shows that while labor and industry have been receiving more and more, the farmer has been receiving less and less each year under our present farm program.

But the most striking contrast is in the trend since the war. In 1919 agriculture, labor, and industrial incomes were at the peak of war inflation, and all the Nation was prospering. And then the war ended, and farm prices dropped like a bucket in the well while everything else advanced, and the tables above show that while farm products are bringing today approximately one-third of what they brought in 1919, labor is receiving three times the wages paid in 1919, industry has more than maintained wartime prices on everything the farmer has to buy, and farm machinery, fertilizer, and all costs of production are higher today than the farmer paid when he was getting $2.40 for wheat, 35 cents for cotton, and $1.50 for corn.

Farm prices and farm income have been steadily dropping for 5 years, while labor and industry costs entering into farm necessities have been rising to heights never before attained in the economic history of the world.

Now, do not misunderstand the attitude of the farmer toward labor or industry. The farmer believes in high wages and high prices, and he is ready to pay them as long as he has buying power to do it. He has cooperated, and the Members of Congress from farming districts have cooperated, at every opportunity to better the condition of both labor and industry—to increase the wages and reduce the hours of labor, and to stabilize industrial prices. We approve of that legislation. We supported it. We voted for it in the expectation that legislation to provide the same benefits for the farmer would come next. And I am convinced that labor would support a similar bill to stabilize farm prices if the Committee on Agriculture would bring one on the floor. But in the 4 years in which farm income has been dropping no such bill has been reported, and in the meantime Congress has continued to enact legislation which has further increased the disparity between farm and factory. We raised freight rates, and the farmer pays the freight both ways. We passed the bus and truck bill, doubling rates to the farmer unable to own a car or buy a truck. We took over the waterways, the farmer's last guaranty of competition in transportation. We put a floor under wages and a ceiling over hours, when the testimony shows that 20 percent of the money required to effectuate it comes from the pockets of the farmer. We passed a bill guaranteeing the price of coal—not only the coal the farmer burns but the coal entering into the cost of every piece of machinery and equipment he buys. We enacted the "hot oil" bill and hiked the price of the oil and gas the farmer must have for his tractor. We maintain the tariff, costing the farmer, along with every other consumer, billions of dollars a year. And, most significant of all, we passed the fair-trade bill, fixing the retail price of every manufactured article from medicine to matches and from razors to radios. We raise the income, reduce the hours, and standardize the prices of everybody but the farmer, and the Committee on Agriculture does nothing about it. "Oh," they say, "the farmers can't get together; the farm organizations can't agree." But neither could the labor organizations agree. There has never been a division short of civil war equal to the division in the ranks of labor, and yet the Committee on Labor has gone along reporting and passing labor legislation. I take off my hat to the Committee on Labor. I pay especial tribute to the able and loyal chairman of the Committee on Labor, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. Norton]. She has rendered a service to the wage earner unequalled in the annals of the House. I wish she was a member of the Committee on Agriculture.

And while we are discussing those who have forgotten the farmer, let me also mention the Director of the Budget. In view of the promise to give the farmer a minimum of 100-percent parity, and our utter failure to keep that promise, we would naturally expect the Budget to favor the agricultural appropriation bill, especially on those appropriations affecting farm income. What is our surprise to receive a Budget estimate which cuts the farm bill deeper than any other appropriation bill, cutting funds for purchase of surplus commodities and food stamps in half and eliminating appropriations for parity payments altogether. Of course, funds for such purposes will not solve the farm problem. They will not provide parity prices. But they do add to the farmer's meager income, and until the Committee on Agriculture provides something better, half a loaf is better than no bread at all. But they are omitted by the Budget, and our subcommittee was under explicit instructions from the whole committee not to exceed the Budget estimates, and in compliance with those instructions we submit a bill more than half a billion dollars under the expenditures for the current year. It is, in round figures, $155,000,000 under the Budget estimates, allowing room for judicious expansion in collaboration with the Senate, if occasion requires, without materially exceeding Budget figures or committee instructions.

Let me say on behalf of the subcommittee that we made these reductions reluctantly. Had we followed our personal preferences, especially with reference to those items in which our colleagues were particularly interested, we would have made no cuts at all, and in numerous instances would have increased such appropriations. The fact that we have reduced any particular item is no indication that funds for such purposes would not be advantageously extended. It simply means that under the necessity of cutting somewhere we selected those items which were less essential, which duplicated or overlapped other activities, and which could more justifiably be deferred until national finances are in better balance and national income at least equals national expenditure.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. May I say, with the gentleman's permission, that, being much interested in the agricultural appropriation bill, I have carefully examined the painstaking hearings conducted by the gentleman's committee and the report. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] deserves the commendation of the House and the country for the fine hearings and the splendid work which his committee has done on this bill. At a later time I shall have something a little more specific to say about that. But his bill is $154,000,000 under the Budget estimate. Today, because of the action taken by the Congress to date under the President's Budget, instead of being within $61,000,000 of our national-debt limit we are three hundred and some million dollars under it, and that much farther away from the necessity for a tax bill. I think the gentleman is to be congratulated, and I hope the House will back his efforts at making this a real economical bill, but one which in no way cripples needed items for agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We appreciate the gentleman's cooperation, and now that the committee has performed its duty we trust he and all other friends of agriculture will also cooperate in finding a solution for the real farm problem. This bill cannot solve it. No amount of appropriations—no hand-outs, however generous—can permanently dispose of it. We must have legislation standardizing income and fixing minimum prices as we have standardized wage scales, fixed retail prices, established freight rates and certificates of convenience and necessity, and the equivalent of all the other legislative and administrative devices contrived to insure industry's costs of production and a reasonable profit. I trust the gentleman and all other farm-minded Members will appreciate the importance of taking steps at this session to prepare for the shock which will follow the close of the war. For every additional dollar in national income received during the war $1.75 will be subtracted from the national income when the war closes. Our munitions plants, airplane factories, and the myriad war-sustained activities of the Nation will draw their fires the night peace is declared and throw their armies of workmen into the streets. Domestic markets will shrink as unemployment mounts. We will have all the gold in existence. We will be the one great creditor nation of the world and the most hated nation on earth. Foreign nations will have nothing with which to buy. International trade will fade with the echo of the last gun and economic chaos will sweep across land and sea. Unless we prepare now for the inevitable catastrophe, agriculture will be the first to suffer, and conditions in 1920 will seem mild in comparison. If we cannot maintain farm prices at three-fourths of parity, aided by drought and war and billions in pump priming, what can we expect when the props are removed and we must depend on normal conditions without foreign markets and war orders, or Government aid? The present system will not do the work. Even if it did, we cannot indefinitely finance one class or one industry, however deserving, out of the Public Treasury. President Roosevelt has emphasized that fact in both his message and his Budget.

Secretary Wallace tells us some permanent plan must be adopted. The Department of Agriculture, after painstaking investigation, submits impartial statistics which leave no room for doubt. Every farm organization and every notable farm leader agrees that a remedy must be found.

Louis J. Taber, master of the National Grange, said at the Seventy-third Annual Convention of the Grange:

We have not yet solved our farm problem. The farmer is not receiving his share of the national income. Although he has educated, housed, clothed, and fed 31 percent of the youth of the land, the prices he has received for the last 10 years equal only 78 percent of the prices he has paid for commodities and services used in rural life.

William Hirth, president of the Missouri Farmers Association and chairman of the historic Corn Belt Committee, who led the fight for the McNary-Haugen bill, and without whose support it could not have been passed, says:

Agriculture is facing a new crisis. Already Secretary Wallace has sounded a warning that there is no assurance that the new Congress will be willing to keep on appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars, * * * and thus it is not unlikely that the farm relief of recent years, economically unsound * * * as it has been, will come to an end, and the farmers will once more be left to root hog or die. * * * Will the Democratic leaders have the courage to tell the consumers of the Nation that they should be willing to pay the farmer cost of production, plus a reasonable profit, for the products of his toil? Or, to put it another way, when they tell our millions of city workers that they are entitled to an American standard of living, will they have the honesty and courage to tell them that they should be willing to concede the same kind of living standard to the farmer? * * * If the farm men and women of the United States were willing to ignore partisan politics and would speak with one voice, they would make demands for economic justice to agriculture which neither party would dare ignore, and the time is close at hand when farmers must act in this manner if the Republic is to be preserved.

Likewise, John Vesecky, of Kansas, president of the National Farmers' Union, was instrumental in securing the adoption at the annual meeting of his organization of a legislative program demanding parity and proposing the enactment of a self-liquidating plan for maintaining the prices of agricultural products.

In similar vein, Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, writes January 30, 1940:

I am willing to support any feasible and reasonable farm program, and support any and all reasonable expenditures in behalf of agriculture, if only there is some prospect that a solution will be found. In the light of the experience of the last few years, with generous appropriations to carry out a program for curtailing supply and expanding demand, is there anyone so bold as to insist that we have found the solution, or, if not, approximate solution? It is results that we are after, and I believe I express the sentiment of a majority of farmers that they seek results rather than experimentation.

And I especially want to quote briefly from a statement made in the last few days by Earl Smith, of Illinois, one of the most able farm leaders in America, when he said:

Everything yet done by Congress for the solution of the farm problem has been to appease the farmer rather than directed fully to the solution of the agricultural problem. There have been reams of evidence presented and filed with the Agricultural Committees of both Houses of Congress relative to the agricultural problem and its remedy.

There has been evidence presented that before any fair jury in the land would have been convincing that a full and effective permanent solution of the farm problem is a first essential to the solution of the unemployment problem and the balancing of the National Budget. This evidence has been temporized with by both Democrats and Republicans.

As a result, politics has crept into both unemployment relief and the farm-surplus problem. Vast expenditures have been and are being made for the temporary relief of both, but the real farm problem, as related permanently to the future welfare of every citizen of this country, has not even been approached.

Is there anyone who can successfully deny that by giving the American farmer a price for his products that represents a fair exchange value for the products of industry the increased buying power of farmers resulting therefrom would require the absorption into the normal labor channels of industry of practically every able-bodied man in America who wants a job at a decent wage?

That we have temporized with this fundamental problem of relationship of farm prices to the cost of things the farmers buy is shown from the fact that the buying power or exchange value of the farm dollar has been increased only from 61 cents in 1932 to 77 cents in 1939. While progress has been made, it is entirely too slow and must be immediately speeded up if the Nation is to avoid more serious difficulties.

Every departmental official and agricultural authority, every farm organization and recognized farm leader in the Nation is demanding action. The time for temporizing is past. The war will finally burn itself out. It is not a contingency. It is not a possibility. It is not a matter of chance. It is merely a question of time, and when it ends no one who witnessed the tragic misfortunes of agriculture following the close of the last war can entertain any doubt as to what will happen. And if the Committee on Agriculture, which is charged with this dire responsibility, permits Congress to adjourn without opportunity to legislate, and the war closes before the next session, they will be calling on the rocks and the mountains to fall upon them and hide them from the wrath of the betrayed and exploited farmers, who have depended on the members of that committee to represent them and protect their interests. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does this bill carry any appropriation to provide the $347,000 deficit due the Montana farmers alone to meet the deficit in parity payments to the farmers under the 1939 appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I have introduced a bill for that purpose—House Joint Resolution 434—which has been favorably reported by the committee and is now on the calendar. It has also been included in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. It is expected to pass both Houses and go to the President in the next few days, and will be in operation in ample time to meet all requirements. No parity payments will be omitted, reduced, or delayed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I wish to correct the figures I quoted. The amount we are short today to meet the parity payments due the farmers for the year 1939, instead of being $337,000, is $9,634,000, and $347,000 of this amount is due the farmers of my State for parity payments under the 1939 program. I wish to make this statement as a correction of the figures I just gave. I also wish to submit the observation to the gentleman that notwithstanding the appropriations that have heretofore been made by the Congress by way of parity payments, we have restored the prices of the American farmer's products up to only 75 percent of parity with the necessities the farmer has to purchase, such as goods, wares, and merchandise; in other words, the farmer has still a 75-cent dollar notwithstanding the $225,000,000 that was appropriated for parity payments a year ago.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman's figures are correct. The resolution makes available $11,000,000 to cover all possible deficiencies.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is reported, although it does not seem to be in the bill, that the committee saw fit to eliminate the farm tenancy program. Is this correct?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The bill, as reported by the full committee, makes no appropriation for farm tenancy.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman agree with the gentleman from Virginia that this step can be taken, that this machinery can be broken up, without injury of any kind?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The farm-tenancy appropriation, judging from our experience with it in my own State, occasioned more dissatisfaction than any other measure that has been actually provided for in this bill. It is my observation that it did more harm than good.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I should like to know on what basis the gentleman makes that statement.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. In the first place only a minority of the counties were allotted funds for farm-tenancy loans and a large part of the time given to the subject was devoted to explaining why these counties were selected and others excluded. And within the counties in which loans were made, the applications, both of those who wished to borrow money and those who wished to sell land, were vastly in excess of the facilities available. When beset by irate farmers who had been denied loans, when their neighbor just across the road, whom they invariably took pains to explain was not so good a farmer or in such dire need as themselves, had been given loan, you were in the predicament of a man up a tall tree and anxious to remain there. Even farmers who owned their farms, or tenant farmers who did not apply for a loan, who were very few, criticized the program on the ground that the Government was picking out a pet of the administration and subsidizing him at the expense of the taxpayers.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman has an unusual district, then, because in every district from which I have heard they all want that particular program. The men who have purchased farms have paid more than 100 percent of the payments due.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is the usual Missouri district in that respect, as evidenced by this clipping taken from the Missouri Farm Bureau News. Here is the headline: "Disappointment for Many." And under that is a subhead: "There Are Twenty Times as Many Applicants as Loans." And then the article goes on to say:

The Farm Security Administration estimates that it has available funds this year for 6,971 loans under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act to enable tenants to buy farms. For these there are on file 133,096 applications. This is the third year of the operation of the act and during the first 2 years 6,180 loans were made to that number from among 147,972 applications.

Of course the number of applicants given here is but a few of those who wanted loans, but who had to be told it was hopeless to apply because loans were not being made in that particular county, or for various other reasons. For every one of these loans you made there were hundreds of disappointed tenants and hundreds ranking with a sense of the injustice of denying them prices for their products which would enable them to buy their own farms, and then denying them the loans the Committee on Agriculture says are solving the tenancy problem.

But the principal objection to the appropriation of funds for the farm-tenancy program at this time is the fact that it does not achieve the purpose for which it was designed. It does not cure farm tenancy, and the testimony before our committee is that every year it has been in operation farm tenancy has increased rather than declined.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That has been true for the last 40 years up to 1933. There has been practically no increase in farm tenancy since 1933, and does the gentleman think, if his statement were correct, that he would want to abandon the one step we have taken that tends to solve this problem?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is to be regretted that the statistics submitted to our committee by the Department of Agriculture do not bear out the gentleman's conclusion. According to the statement before the committee farm tenancy is increasing at the rate of approximately 40,000 a year. Dr. Alexander testified that 4,296 of the 6,000,000 farmers of the United States had been put on farms in the year 1938-39, and 4,296 subtracted from the 40,000 who lost their farms during that year would leave a net increase of 35,704 in farm tenancy, notwithstanding the farm-tenant program and the $40,000,000 appropriated to finance it. There is only one thing that can solve the problem of farm tenancy and that is to increase agricultural prices so that the man on the farm will be able to make cost of production and have enough over to pay taxes and stand off the sheriff. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman is just as wrong as he can be.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. No. What is wrong is the price of farm products. Prices paid the farmer for what he sells are so low, in comparison with the prices he has to pay for what he buys, that he cannot make enough to buy a farm. Or if he owns a farm cannot make enough to pay running expenses and have enough left over to pay taxes and interest. You could put the best tenant farmer in the United States on the best farm between the two seas and unless you paid him enough for what he grew, it would be merely a matter of time before the sheriff would have the farm. What brought on all this wholesale loss of farms under foreclosure of mortgages? It was the fact that agricultural prices were below parity. That is the sole cause of farm tenancy and you will never cure farm tenancy until you go right back to where it started and pay the farmer fair wages for his labor and decent prices for his products. If you want to solve the farm-tenancy problem, let the Committee on Agriculture bring out a bill to put a floor under farm prices just as the Committee on Labor has reported and passed bills putting a floor under wages. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. There is no use to bring out a bill if the Appropriations Committee is going to kill it. [Applause.] Let me say to the gentleman, he has not thought this thing through, and that is plain. As a matter of fact, I favor an increase in prices, but it so happens that when prices increase, land prices increase also; and the gentleman will not solve the tenancy problem in that way, because tenancy has increased more when prices were high than when they were low. And the gentleman is flying in the face of the facts when he states they can own their own homes in that way. They are beginning to own their own homes under the present farm-tenancy program, and the gentleman now kills it.

I agree with a measure of economy, but when the gentleman takes a machete and an ax and tries to destroy every step that is being taken in that direction, I do not agree with him that nothing is being done. We have the lowest farm interest rates that ever prevailed in this country; we have provision for rural electrification; we have provision for disposal of surpluses, which the gentleman's committee, I understand, has practically killed; and we have a provision for starting on the solution of a problem that has been accumulating for 75 years—farm tenancy—and you cannot cure it in 1 year, and the gentleman now offers to further that program by destroying it, which is an absurdity. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am surprised to hear the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture say that we ought not to give the farmer a fair price for his products because it will increase the price of land.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman cannot misquote me in that way. I have said that I want to increase farm prices.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. But the gentleman said that it increases the price of his land and, apparently, that is the reason he will not bring in a bill to give the farmer fair prices.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman misinterprets my statement. I favor fair prices for the farmer, but while that will solve the price question, which needs to be solved, there are various wings to the farm problem, and you will not solve the entire problem by solving one wing of it. When you solve the price question, you will not solve the question of ownership unless you tackle that problem directly.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, no one can survey the results of the farm-tenancy program without being impressed with the utter futility of the attempt to solve the farm problem by such means. Even in years when the Federal income is in excess of expenditures, it is a disturbing factor. In the most favorable light it merely selects one farmer in a hundred thousand, with no advantage whatever to the other millions of farmers in the Nation. The great problem before the farmer and the American people today is the low price of farm products. This program cannot affect that problem in any way. It cannot add a penny to the price of any farm product or to the individual or national farm income. We have promised the farmer parity prices and he expects us to keep that promise, and yet farm tenancy has so occupied the attention of the Committee on Agriculture this session that apparently they have completely lost sight of the important duty before this Congress of discharging that obligation.

You are paying the farmer less than 75 percent of parity. Why do you not do something about it? Until you do something about it, the farmers will continue to lose their farms and farm tenancy will continue to increase and the entire Nation will continue to suffer from lack of business and unemployment due to the lack of buying power on the farm.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. JONES of Texas. We have authorized parity payments. Does the gentleman think he will accomplish that by cutting out the provision for carrying out those stipulations?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. As the gentleman perhaps knows, there was no provision for parity payments in the estimates submitted to Congress by the Bureau of the Budget. And as the Committee on Appropriations, long before the report of the subcommittee on this particular bill, had issued explicit instructions that no bill should be reported out this session in excess of the Budget estimates, and was in position to enforce such instructions, the question of an appropriation for parity payment was not before the subcommittee at any time. Under the circumstances, there was no means by which it could have been brought before the subcommittee for consideration.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am glad the gentleman makes that statement, because I have always regarded him as being interested in this problem, and I was amazed that while they have made comparatively few reductions on other bills, they cut this one 47 percent. It is a surprising thing, coming from the gentleman from Missouri, and I am glad to have his explanation that he was acting under the instructions of the full committee, and I absolve him of that, but that does not solve the problem.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I hardly see how there can be any misapprehension as to my position on parity payments. I have made the fight for them, both in the committee and in the House each year they have been provided. Last year I brought the appropriation of $225,000,000 for this purpose back from conference by one vote, and, on my motion, largely through the valiant cooperation of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], the House agreed to the appropriation by the slender margin of five votes. No opportunity has yet been afforded to secure consideration of an appropriation for parity payments this session, but in due time I trust we can again find occasion to call on the gentleman from Texas, and in such event I am certain we can again depend on him to put it through.

Of course, the amount we are able to provide for parity payments will not bring on the millennium. They were not able this year to push farm prices up to even three-fourths of parity. And we all realize that they are merely emergency provisions, and we cannot depend on appropriations of this character from the Federal Treasury as a permanent policy. But, in contrast with the tenancy program, which benefits only one farmer here and there over the State, parity payments reach every farmer in America, and this year added 11 cents to the price received for every bushel of wheat, 1.6 cents on every pound of cotton, and 6 cents on every bushel of corn, paid by Government check. And the $225,000,000 added to the buying power of the farm was reflected in the business of every merchant in the Nation and contributed to the employment of thousands of workmen in factory and shop and plant throughout the land, who otherwise would have been without a job.

But parity payments are at best merely a stopgap. They pay the farmer less than 75 percent of parity. I trust the gentleman's committee will meet and bring in permanent legislation to standardize farm prices at not less than 100 percent of parity on the same basis on which every other industry and service is now enjoying parity or better. Many proposals have been suggested for consideration and enactment, including specific measures recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture and farm leaders and farm organizations. Surely out of all this wealth of material some plan can be formulated to meet the situation. I trust the committee will at least meet and consider them. That is all we ask. It is my understanding that up to this time there has been no consideration of any means to meet the situation we must face when the war closes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Since the Secretary of Agriculture has been fair enough to state that he never can accomplish parity or cost-of-production prices for farmers under his bill, I understand the position of the gentleman from Missouri is that we ought to abide by what the Secretary says in that respect and have the guts to get up here and either give them cost of production or parity as a floor under farm prices, so that when this war does end, if it ends soon, the farmer will not be left without anything on earth for his farm products.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Any farmer who went through the last war can testify to that. It would be presumptuous to pass on the merits or demerits of any of the measures which have been submitted, but in multiplicity of counsel there is wisdom, and I hope the Committee on Agriculture will meet and consider the entire field; and when they do, I have every confidence that they will be able to evolve a plan, or a combination of plans, that will answer our needs and protect the interests of the farmer and the country.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to my colleague from Missouri.

Mr. NELSON. My colleague, than whom the farmer has no better friend in Congress, has referred to the collapse in farm prices which he anticipates will follow the present World War, and has made reference to the collapse which came at the close of the World War a quarter of a century ago. Obviously there can be no such collapse—that is, to such a degree as came then—because up to now the farm prices have not advanced in any respect because of the World War now being waged overseas. What the farmer buys has to a considerable extent advanced in price, but not what he sells.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I regret that I cannot agree with my colleague. All authorities agree that the situation will be infinitely worse unless legislation is enacted to protect farm prices from the same conditions which followed the last war. It is true that farm prices cannot fall so hard, because they will not have so far to fall. At the close of the last war wheat was selling at $2.40 a bushel. Today it is a little under a dollar. When the armistice was signed in 1918, hogs were selling at $24.50. I sold some on the St. Louis market at that price, myself. Today they are down to approximately $5. Eggs were 60 cents; corn was $1.50. A drop from those prices was a greater shock than a fall from the prices we are receiving today. But the shock was cushioned then because the Government lent European nations $10,000,000,000, which they spent exclusively in the United States, and which provided a market as long as it lasted. This time we will not lend them a thin dime, because, with the exception of Finland, none of them have paid back what they borrowed then. As a result, the reaction will be more immediate, more certain, and more drastic than before. Still, the Committee on Agriculture has considered no plans to protect our farmers from the smash every Member of this House knows is coming.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to my good friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the gentleman want to leave the impression that the present agricultural bill, which definitely controls production of those crops that produce a surplus, the program of loans, the program of control, the program of insurance, the program of benefit payments, the program of parity payments, which the gentleman so ably supported at the last session, have all been wasted, and that American agriculture has not in any way benefited from the program under this administration?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman evidently overlooked my statement on the benefits to agriculture accruing from the measures he has mentioned. They have supported the market to the extent of preventing a return to 1932 prices, as was pointed out by Secretary Wallace whom I quoted. But they have not and cannot give us parity prices. Secretary Wallace testified positively and emphatically they could not and would not support parity. It is not a matter of surmise or conjecture. We have tried them out. And even under the most favorable conditions, with a drought in the Northwest driving up the price of wheat—to the speculator not to the farmer who sold it long ago—even with the drought and with three-fourths of the nations at war and the other fourth arming for war, and supplemented by billions of dollars spent for relief, the best they could do was just a little short of three-fourths of parity. If that is true now what do you suppose will happen to farm prices when the war closes with Europe and Asia bankrupt, and our war industries closing down? And most significant of all—a depleted United States Treasury unable to supply further parity payments or finance the many other activities which are providing a market for farm products now and will be missing when peace and exhaustion and destitution come to Europe. Even if they would do as well after the war as now, would you consider that enough? The Government promised the farmers parity and it promised Members of Congress their salaries for services rendered. If, when you went to collect your salary, they paid you 75 cents on the dollar would you think the Government had carried out a splendid program? Well, the farmers feel the same way about it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Parity payments are cut out of this bill; in other words, if this bill is passed we get no parity payments.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Parity payments never were in the bill. They were not even submitted in the Budget estimates.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I realize, just as was said by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON], that there is not in the House of Representatives any more zealous advocate of the farmer than the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]. May I not say to him that I believe his committee could carry out the instructions of the full committee to stay within the Budget recommendations of the President providing they would take from this huge anticipated appropriation to be made to construct battleships that will never be needed—at least we hope they will never be needed—and give that money to the American farmer, and maybe some of the poor people on relief.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Unfortunately, this subcommittee did not have the battleships before it. In such case we might have made some adjustment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman would be in favor of that, would he not, taking it from building battleships and giving it to the farmers and unemployed?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Of course, the gentleman understands that the appropriation for parity payments on the 1940, this year's crop, the 1940 crop, have already been made. It is the provision for parity payments on the 1941 crop that is in question.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, who knows more about the farm question than any man outside of the committee and who has rendered as valuable a service to agriculture as any Member of the House.

Mr. RANKIN. I agree with what the gentleman from Montana said. We all know that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is always in sympathy with the farmer.

The gentleman from Missouri said a while ago that we were not subsidizing the farmer; that we were subsidizing the people in the city who eat the things that the farmers produce. As a matter of fact, are we not subsidizing the middlemen who are profiteering on both producer and consumer? I hope to place in the RECORD an article from the New York Times of January 23, which shows that one Mr. F. A. Countway, manufacturer of soap made from cottonseed oil, soybean oil, peanut oil, and so forth, is raking down a salary of $496,000 a year and had $200,000, if I remember correctly, added to that salary within the last 12 months. There are many other processors of farm products drawing salaries larger than the salary of the President of the United States. They are the ones who are profiteering on the American farmer, not only the American farmer but also on the man in the city who buys the things produced by the farmer.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman has touched on one of the vital phases of this question. The hearings before the committee developed the fact that there was not only a wide difference between the price received by the farmer and that paid by the consumer, but that the margin is rapidly increasing and the middleman is taking a greater toll today, both from the producer and the consumer, than ever before. It is a situation which merits attention, considerably more than passing attention, and I trust the gentleman from Mississippi will follow it up.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. This morning the Budget estimate for the Surplus Commodities Corporation for food stamps went out on a point of order. Can the gentleman tell us whether the $100,000,000 available from 30 percent of the customs receipts will provide for and take care of those cities that have already been approved for this stamp plan up to this time?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is true. The original estimate for the amount which would be available from section 32 of the act—that is, 30 percent of the customs duties—was $90,000,000. Under the revised estimate just received the amount is in excess of $100,000,000. This will be available to continue the stamp plan in those cities in which it is now in use, and additional cities will be added as conditions justify. The system has proven so satisfactory to the producer, the consumer, and the merchants through whom it operates that the bulk of commodities available for relief will be distributed through this agency.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is that over and above the 28 cities that participated in the program last year? There may be other cities that have not been listed but which have been approved.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am only familiar with those cities listed in the report. A small part of the $100,000,000 will be sufficient to take care of the 28 cities listed. The expectation is that other cities will be added as the program progresses.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BOLLES. Does not the gentleman from Missouri believe that one of the helps we could have at the close of the war would be the abrogation and repeal of all reciprocal-trade treaties, saving this American market for the American people?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I believe that would be the most unfortunate thing for the American farmer that could be done. If we close our borders, if we refuse to buy we cannot expect to sell. All testimony before the committee on that point was conclusive. Market demand for farm products and prices of all farm commodities are materially higher than they would have been but for the stimulating effect of the reciprocal-trade treaties. I trust the gentleman will take time to read the hearings on that question.

Mr. JENSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. Can the gentleman inform the House whether or not there was a penny recommended by the President in the Budget for parity payments or anything recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture for parity payments?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Nothing was recommended by the Budget for parity payments in the belief that as the European war progresses farm prices will rise. If they reach parity, there will be no need for funds for these payments.

The President has given assurance that if that expectation is not realized by the time the bill is returned from the Senate, he will request an appropriation for the purpose. Of course, the President has from the first favored parity payments in the absence of other legislative means of securing parity, with the provision that Congress provide the revenue to pay them. His position on that point is unassailable. We should enact permanent legislation for the purpose. It is to be hoped that the Committee on Agriculture will meet soon to take up the consideration of legislation with that in view.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, the United States is slowly but surely treading the road to war both in Europe and in Asia.

It is proceeding toward tragic involvement in the present wars step by step, as it did in the last war; first, arms; then, credits; and finally, men.

The United States has abandoned neutrality. Neutrality, the rule of impartial treatment of all belligerents, is the only policy that has kept and can keep a nation out of war when war comes. It kept the United States out of war in Europe and Asia for 150 years, until the World War of 1914-18, when abandonment of neutrality led directly to our participation.

The United States has substituted political intervention for neutrality both in Europe and in Asia. Political intervention means war in the end.

President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull have assailed in offensive and provocative language country after country with which the United States is at peace.

In 1935 they took provocative and hostile action in the Ethiopian war far in advance of the League of Nations, and the consequences, by reason of subsequent events, were humiliating to the United States.

Our Government subsidized China in 1938 in the Sino-Japanese war, in the same amount in dollars as Great Britain, and strange as it may seem, we thereby allied ourselves in Asia with communistic Russia, which is actively supporting the Chinese.

They sent American officials to Czechoslovakia in 1938 to support Great Britain in the political crisis there which eventuated in the Munich settlement, and again the United States was involved in the humiliating and disastrous denouement.

The President and the State Department openly and aggressively supported Great Britain every step of the way and at every turn up to the moment of the actual declaration of war by Great Britain and Germany.

Hostilities between Russia and Finland began on November 30, and within two weeks President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull had authorized a loan of $10,000,000 to Finland and sanctioned shipment to Finland of United States airplanes built for our Government. The administration now proposes that the Congress authorize a further loan of $30,000,000 to Finland. These acts are in flagrant violation of neutrality. They are hostile acts. They are acts of war.

No matter how great are our sympathy and our admiration for Finland, the Congress should not officially approve United States intervention on that war front, or on any other war front in Europe or Asia. To do so would be to commit the United States inescapably to war.

In the present war between Russia and Finland, the President and Secretary Hull are having the United States pursue exactly the same policy as is being pursued by Great Britain.

In the Ethiopian war, in the Sino-Japanese war, in the Czechoslovakian crisis, and the Munich settlement, and in the Russian-Finnish war, the "parallel action" to which Secretary Hull has so often alluded when vehemently denying that there was any alliance between the United States and Great Britain is clearly evidenced and is compelling proof of the alliance of the ruling heads of Great Britain and the executive branch of our own Government. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, it was in no spirit of exaltation that I listened to the confession today that the farm problem has not been solved. It was with no exaltation that I listened to the confession that our industrial problem has not been solved. But when all is said and done and all the rhetoric has been wasted, you gentlemen know just as well as I do that the two primary problems of this country, the problem of employment on which, of course, hinges relief, and the problem of equal purchasing power for the farm dollar, have not been solved. Our country is akin to Russia, in one sense, in that those are the two major countries where you have such a division between agriculture and industry that both of them are primary problems. I can think of countries in South America where agriculture is dominant. I can think of countries like Japan and Germany where industry is very preeminently dominant. But in our country we have to find a solution for both problems, and that solution has not been found.

It is essential that a solution be found, because all the things we are doing are so futile until that solution has been found. When last in this Well, speaking on the independent offices appropriation bill, I pointed out the forward march of foreclosures by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and that as of this time about 178,000 foreclosures have been authorized. This is not going to stop until unemployment and relief have been solved. Diminution of national income, reduction in national revenue, is not going to be solved until these primary problems are disposed of. I make so bold as to say that I doubt our ability actually to reach a balanced Budget until you put the ax at the cause. The cause, of course, is the drain upon the Federal Treasury. Until that drain is removed not only on the Federal Treasury but upon State treasuries and local treasuries as well, we are not going to get anywhere in seeking a solution to this problem.

If I wanted to document my remarks today, first, as to how much we expended, and, secondly, whether we have found the solution, I would ask you to look at page 1032 of the Budget for 1941. This is not my budget. It is the President's Budget. There he says:

Moneys for recovery and relief, total amount provided to October 31, 1939—

grants, aids, and expenses, $15,452,000,000. Federal Public Works projects, $3,542,000,000. Total nonrepayable—

Not my language; the President's language; the Budget Bureau's language—

Total nonrepayable, $19,001,000,000.

Now, then, the President said this in his message on January 3, 1940:

We have not yet found a way to employ the surplus of our labor which the efficiency of our industrial processes has created.

That is not my confession. It is the confession of the President of the United States, who has indicated to the country time after time since his campaign messages of 1932 that a solution would be found. And here writ into the record he says there have been $19,001,000,000 of nonrepayable expenditures. Then when we look at the score, we find that on the 27th of January 1940 the American Federation of Labor reports 9,379,000 people out of work.

Mr. Chairman, we have not found the answer. When we talk about the farm problem and about appropriations for agriculture, you cannot divorce that from the industrial problem, because there is a great segment of the consuming public on short rations, and until their fortunes have been rehabilitated we are like Ishmael shouting in the wilderness rather futilely and making a gesture without finding a durable solution.

I wish time permitted my going into a rather fulsome discussion of this whole industrial matter, but I am not going to do so. I am going to leave one thought after this administration confession and apology. I am afraid that if we do not find a solution pretty soon, there is going to be a failing faith in the capacity of government as now constituted to find the answer; and when that lack of faith becomes sufficiently widespread, then you have got a real problem on your hands that is not dissimilar from that which has taken other countries and deposited them from the side of democracy to the side of totalitarianism. The best language and the best answer you can get to this whole problem you will find in Isaiah. I do not remember the chapter and the verse offhand, but there appears this language:

And it shall come to pass, that when they shall be hungry, they shall fret themselves, and curse their king and their God, and look upward.

That was written by the old patriarch on parchment several thousand years ago, but it is just as persuasive and it is just as logical and it is just as durable as it was the day Isaiah wrote it.

Today you hear people say that since we are not finding the solution to these problems perhaps our Government no longer has the capacity to do so as presently constituted, and therefore we ought to do something about it; we ought to get a new Government. That is the thing that brought Hitler out of the crucible of bitterness and despair; that is the thing that brought Mussolini out of the realms of despair. When the war was over I had a chance to go into Italy to make some observations. I saw it. I saw that brooding and dismal despair on every hand in Italy. I saw people completely lost and having no sense of direction. They did not know where they were going.

I never think of a lack of direction but what I think of a story of a Kentucky judge back in the days when Abraham Lincoln was in the legislature in Illinois. This judge had a rather happy habit of having a bottle of corn in his inside pocket. He had a rubber tube running from that corn up to his pipe. He would sit on the bench all day puffing, without any smoke coming from the bowl; but in the afternoon he got pretty mellow. He came out of the courthouse one afternoon and threw a saddle on his horse, ready to go home. A young lawyer standing there said to him, "Hey, judge, you've got the saddle on backward." The judge looked at him with that species of judicial contempt that only judges know and said to him, "How the devil do you know in what direction I am going?"

That is the answer today. There is a lack of direction, as there was a lack of direction over there. When there is a lack of direction to thinking then people say, "Well, let's get a new kind of government."

I remember, as you remember, the observance of the birthday of this country on March 4, 1939. There stood the President, there stood the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Vice President, and our beloved Speaker. Here was the Cabinet and here were the Members of the Supreme Court, the Members of the Senate, and the Members of the House, all together under this one seal-studded roof. We were having a birthday party for our country, 150 years old.

I sat somewhere along in there. I closed my eyes. I could just fairly imagine our great and illustrious predecessors marching through the Well of this House—they who were a part of the national stream—James Madison, in the First Congress; Abraham Lincoln, who served one term in this body in 1846 and 1847; McKinley; James G. Blaine; and Garfield, who sprang from the House to the Presidency—all contributed to the moving stream of our history and then disappeared on yonder shore. I thought of the contributions they had made, and then I began to wonder about those 150 years we had survived without any major change in our Government.

Will there be a two-hundredth anniversary? I do not know. Will there be a two hundred and fiftieth anniversary? I do not know. But when I see these disintegrating forces in the country and in the world, I begin to wonder some whether after 150 years we can hold our country together. Of course, the danger is that people whose bellies are empty, whose minds are bitter—and you know it and I know it—may undertake sometime to raise their voices in crescendo; and if there are enough of them they will say, "Let us get a new form of government."

So, Mr. Chairman, we have not found the answer to this problem, but when I prefaced my remarks I said that it is no gloating or exultation on my part. But how provincial, narrow, and bigoted it would be for me as a Republican to draw the party line so closely and so narrowly as to say, "Well, that is swell. You Democrats have not found the answer. We will make mincemeat out of you in 1940." We may or we may not do that; that remains to be seen. But that certainly would be a provincial attitude, because it does not find a solution to the problem. After all, our own political destiny and the destiny of any one party should always be subordinate to the welfare and the well-being of the country.

So your President stood here on the 3d of January and confessed that we had not found the answer to the problem, and in the Budget message he said we had expended $19,100,000,000. That is No. 1.

No. 2 is the farm problem. We have not found the solution to that problem, either. I live out in the Corn Belt. I want to get everything I can for my farmers. I want to get that kind of a policy that is most durable and most beneficial not only for the farmers in the Corn Belt but for the farmers in all sections of the country. I can think of nothing better we could do as we think of this farm bill for a little while than to get a clear-cut perspective of what we have done, how much money we have expended, and what the score is at the present time.

We have 6,812,000 farms in the country. It may be well to remember that figure, and it is not hard to remember—6,812,000. That was indicated by the agricultural census of 1935. We have 513,000,000 acres of cropland and we have 31,800,000 people who are identified with agriculture.

Ever since I can remember we have been trying to get parity for the farmer. What is parity? Well, first of all, parity is a condition under which there is such a relationship between what the farmer has to spend and the price he must pay for the things he must buy and the prices which he receives for his products, so that he will buy on the level that was attained in the base period from 1909 to 1914. In other words, we want to go back to that good old period of 1909-14 when there was a balance between what the farmer had to pay and what he received. So the first and most important thing is that parity is a condition; and when you do not have that condition, you can try to do something about it by legislation. You can try to induce artificial parity, or, rather, induce it artificially by various restraints, controls, subsidies, benefits, and so forth; and this is the thing we have been laboring on since 1932; and while there has been some progress—oh, you cannot deny that; many conditions are better than they were back in the dismal, dark days of 1932 and 1933—yet we are a long way from the goal.

Now, there are some ways of attempting to provide parity. If prices are low because you have got too much farm commodities in the country, then one way to get parity is to reduce the supply on the theory that if you have less available in the market prices will go up. There is another way to bring about parity, and that is to expand consumption and demand.

We have attempted both of them. We have done a lot of both of them; and when I think of reducing supply, here is what we have done, just to get the perspective in your minds: Under reduction of supply, in the hope that reduction would raise prices, first of all, we plowed under, and there was lots of crop destruction, particularly in the Southland. There is no need to bother you about the millions of acres to be plowed under. All I need to say is that it is uncontroverted that there has been destruction of crops for the purpose of reducing supplies; and, secondly, we have gone in for acreage reduction, under the original Agricultural Adjustment Act, under the act of 1938, and by other devices, trying to reduce cotton, trying to reduce rice, reducing corn, reducing wheat and other basic commodities. What was the purpose of it? To reduce the supply in the hope that the price would go up. This is item No. 2 in the program.

No. 3. We made loans to withhold commodities from the market. I think one of the most interesting exhibits in all the West are the thousands of corn cans, galvanized cans, holding 2,500 bushels of corn which stand out in the Corn Belt. You see them in the villages and the towns and hamlets. There you have an articulated example of what was done to reduce supply. In other words, withholding supply from market. And so we made loans and put the 1937 corn and the 1938 corn in these galvanized corn cans for the purpose of keeping it from the market in the hope that there would be no diminution in the price.

My good friend from Illinois hands me a picture, here, of these cans. They look like a lot of oil tanks in Texas. As a matter of fact, they are galvanized corn cribs in Illinois, and I suppose this is an aerial picture that was taken of them, but it is only a part of the whole program to reduce supply.

The next step was marketing agreements. What was the purpose of marketing agreements? To hold things off the market for a while, to regulate the speed with which commodities find their way into the markets; and it is nothing else except a regulation of supply which was designed to improve prices.

Finally, we had surplus removal operations, trying to get rid of the supply through various methods with which the Department has been empowered and, finally, we went in for a land-acquisition program. You may say to me that we are taking marginal land out of cultivation. It does not make any difference much whether it is marginal or submarginal, or any other kind of land.

It may raise 10, 15, or 20 bushels of corn to the acre, and in that proportion it has been contributing to the supply.

Now, I notice from the hearings that we have taken 10,157,000 acres out of circulation, so to speak, because the control or ownership is vested in Uncle Sam today under the land-acquisition program. So there you have a whole host of steps—crop reduction, crop destruction, curtailment, withholding from market, marketing agreements, export subsidies, land acquisition, surplus removal operations—all for the purpose of diminishing the supply, in the hope of achieving this elusive thing that we call parity.

You can get at it from the other side also. To get parity you can reduce the supply or you can expand the demand—or attempt both. We have been trying to do that every way possible. There are any number of programs on the books today. But what I am interested in, and what you are interested in today, is the score. I am not going to take the responsibility for giving you the score. I am going to let a greater man in the field of agriculture than I do it. That is none other than Edward A. O'Neill, who is president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and who spent a whole morning with the committee in the finest kind of fellowship as we sought to get the benefit of his information; the benefit of the accumulated information of the American Farm Bureau Federation and its executive council. Here is Mr. O'Neill's testimony, after all the effort that has been made in order to get parity. He said:

The gross farm income in 1939 is 26½ percent, or $1,800,000,000 under parity.

Now, we spent a lot of money, gentlemen. We have spent a lot of money over a period of 5 or 6 years in the hope that we could ameliorate the farm condition. Mr. O'Neill tells us that we are still 26½ percent below parity on the basic commodities, or a total of $1,800,000,000.

How much money have we expended for farm payments? Mr. O'Neill and his very able assistant, Mr. Ogg, who is the statistician for the American Farm Bureau Federation, advised the committee that the farmers have received $3,112,000,000 in payments; that on the 15th of December 1939 cotton was 6.16 below parity. That is a long way. Corn was still more than 25 cents a bushel below parity. Wheat was almost 31 cents a bushel below parity on the 15th of December 1939. Rice was 70 cents per 100 pounds below parity. Various kinds of tobacco were below parity in prices ranging from 1 cent to 3 cents a pound.

Now, there is the score, after all the things that we have done. Frankly, I just wonder where we are going. I share with my genial chairman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] the belief that something else has to be done about this thing; that we are not getting to the heart of the problem or finding the solution by constantly doling money into all kinds of payments, only to find after 6 or 7 years that we are still $1,800,000,000 from parity on the five basic commodities that are dealt with in the Farm Act of 1938.

In the course of all this program we have made a lot of concessions; we have made a lot of sacrifices. For instance, the world wheat acreage is up 30,000,000 acres. Our wheat acreage is up a little, but they have been taking advantage of the fact that we have been reducing and paying money to reduce. The true world corn acreage is about 13,000,000 greater than in years past. Our decrease is about 12,000,000. You know you cannot sit out in the middle of the Corn Belt and see all those fine golden ears hanging on those sturdy stalks, hoping that they will be translated into terms of adequate income for farmers, and then see some of the most fertile land out there that God ever placed on this footstool being diverted to other uses and taken out of cash crops on the theory that by reducing we will effect parity. We have not done it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. While you have been reducing corn acreage 12,000,000 acres in this country, Argentina this year has doubled its acreage.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would not be a bit surprised. When I think of corn reduction, we are going to have another reduction in 1940. On the 29th of December the Department issued a release—1940 State corn allotments in commercial area announced, with this language from the Department of Agriculture:

The 1940 allotment is 12 percent less than the allotment for 1939.

Now, take 12 out of every 100 acres of corn away from us under the production of 1939, and finally we get down to the place where we have cut off the dog's tail a little at a time, until there will be no dog left, and all the volume gone; all the jobless people who reflect that lack of farm volume, as a matter of fact. That is why I say, with all deference to my good friend from Texas [Mr. JONES] we are much better off, but after this tremendous expenditure that was made, but we are still so far away from parity; and here we are fighting the same old problem of making an assault upon the Federal Treasury and aggravate the Federal deficit with no hope of a solution in sight.

I am willing to support any feasible and reasonable farm program and support any and all reasonable expenditures in behalf of agriculture if only there is some prospect that a solution will be found. In the light of the experiences of the last few years with generous appropriations to carry out a program for curtailing supply and expanding demand, is there anyone so bold as to insist that we have found the solution or even approximated a solution? It is results we are after, and I believe I express the sentiment of the majority of farmers that they seek results rather than experimentation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I agree with the gentleman that this whole problem cannot be solved by reduction, but does not the gentleman realize that the total production of corn in this country the past year is far above average and that we have not really reduced the production of corn in quantity?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman knows full well that back in the lush days we had 110,000,000 acres of corn, whereas today we have 90,000,000 acres of corn.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Over a 10-year period we produced 2,300,000,000 bushels of corn. We produced about 3,000,000,000 bushels last year. That is but one phase of the program. The gentleman must realize that there are other wings to this.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me show the gentleman what that approach is. Here is John Jones, a farmer out in Tazewell County, Ill. They come along and say: "Mr. Jones, you are a good citizen and we know you are going to cooperate with this farm program." John swells out his chest and, like a true American, says, "Yes; I will cooperate." All right, they give him an allotment; they reduce his corn acreage; but it is a challenge to his ingenuity just as it has been to all farmers. Then one day he skims the pages of the paper and notices that there is a chance to take less acreage, plant better seed, hybrid seed, yet produce more corn.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman believe that is a good thing to stimulate?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman believe it is a good thing to have unlimited production of a commodity, regardless of the amount on hand?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not so sure whether I do or do not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the manufacturers of automobiles had done that in 1931 and 1932, we perhaps could have gotten automobiles at $100 apiece and plows at about $10 or $15 apiece; and then we could have afforded to have produced without regard to the market.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But, Mr. Chairman, I must remind the gentleman that the administration had never made it its responsibility to give everybody an automobile. It has, however, said that there would not be any starving people in this country; and while they may not be on the ragged edge of starvation, yet when you put a fellow on $44 a month on W. P. A. and let him try to nurture a family of four or five kids, he is so close to starvation that it is not even funny. Nine millions of our people are still out of work, many of them are on the fringe of starvation. I am sure the gentleman will agree that reduced production of foodstuffs and fibers in the face of this condition does not seem very persuasive.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman believe it is going to solve this problem to reduce the appropriation for these policies 47 percent? That is what this bill does.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not so sure about that. I am not so sure but what a new Domestic Allotment Act might be a better answer than the present act.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This problem has been going on for 100 years—ever since the first tariff bill was enacted. We cannot solve it in 1 year, but the gentleman is not going to help solve it by destroying any chance to work it out.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not want to destroy. I am willing to pay to produce, but with all the efforts under this administration and all the billions of dollars expended we have not gotten the answer yet, and the gentleman knows that is a fact.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The farmer's total income has been nearly doubled since the program started. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have high regard for the incisive thinking of the gentleman from Texas, but what do we find when we look at the situation we have been trying to improve; what have we got for our great expenditure of money?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Let us not stop; I say let us keep on.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We have gone pretty far. We put an N. R. A. on the books; we put a Wage and Hour Act on the books; we put the Wagner Labor Relations Act on the books; why? For the purpose of putting a ceiling over the hours of labor and a floor under the wages of labor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

The result of this is reflected in higher prices for all the things the farmer must buy. Having done that—you voted for it and I voted for it—what have we done? We have kicked up the level that must be reached before we can get parity; so parity is a shifting quantity, or a shifting condition, that goes up under the impact of so many things we have done in the Congress. The result is that we are almost as far away from parity today as we were in 1937 and 1938. There is illogic in that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I agree that the final answer has not been found, but I do not agree that we have not made a good start or that we have not made great progress.

I believe we are doing that. The gentleman mentions a certain thing that has been talked about here and that is price fixing. No one knows what the final answer will be, but if you try price fixing on corn, 85 percent of which never crosses the county line and is fed in the county in which it is produced, does the gentleman think any price-fixing scheme could apply there?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me ask the gentleman, How are we ever going to reach parity if we are fixing all along the line wages in industry and in one thing and another, so that there is a tendency for prices to go up rather than come down, then require more money for relief payments and parity payments in order to reach that elusive condition? That is the illogic of the thing.

Mr. JONES of Texas. When we have about $40,000,000,000 of industrial production that is protected at an average of at least 20 percent, about $8,000,000,000, the amount that is spent on an effort at farm parity is a drop in the bucket compared with it. The farmer has in the main assumed that burden. I am not talking about the merits of the program. It is a program, and the gentleman believes in that program.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman we have been approaching parity from one standpoint alone.

Mr. JONES of Texas. No.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will prove that statement. We have approached parity from the standpoint of letting these wages and prices reach a level, sometimes under the impetus of legislation by this Congress, then trying to reach up to that level. I wonder whether there is not an approach from the top down in the hope that perhaps there can be a reduction downward insofar as industrial prices are concerned and then we can reach parity without such astronomical expenditures. That is a thing that has received no attention to speak of from the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Texas. There may be some merit in the gentleman's position on that, but certainly the tendency to make it further out of balance does not justify the abandonment of efforts to bring it into balance.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; I rest on the broad conclusion, which is not controverted, I am sure, because it is documented here, that we failed in finding a solution to the two primary problems, the problem of unemployment and the relief drain and the problem of equal purchasing power for the farm dollar. There is not a soul in this chamber today who can controvert the truth of that statement.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I agree with that, but we have made a great deal of progress toward it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We just fiddle away at a solution of many other corollary problems, and we cannot do anything until those two problems are solved. When the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations was speaking, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture was quite interested in the Farm Security Administration and farm tenancy loans. So I want to address myself to that subject for a moment. I doubt whether the House has had an adequate picture of what this farm tenancy program is. I am going to give it to you. These are the facts and you can stand on them.

In the first place, we are making 40-year 3-percent loans to people with which to buy farms. We made available $10,000,000 in 1938, $25,000,000 in 1939, $40,000,000 in 1940, and the present bill carried $25,000,000 when it came out of the subcommittee, but this was stricken from the bill by a vote of 25 to 9 in the full committee.

There are 6,812,000 farms in the country, according to the agricultural census of 1935; 2,865,000, or 42 percent, of those farms are tenant farms.

Mr. Alexander, of the Farm Security Administration, came before the committee last year, and he came before the committee this year, and gave us facts about the increase in farm tenancy. He said it was increasing at the rate of 40,000 a year. On page 1186 of the hearings on the 1940 departmental bill he stated the increase in tenancy was 55,000 to 60,000 a year. These are not my figures. This is Mr. Alexander, the Administrator of the Farm Security Administration, speaking. Let us see what we have done on loans. They made 1,832 loans in 1937 and 1938, 4,296 in 1938 and 1939, and they estimate 7,200 loans in 1940. The total for 3 years is 13,328 loans. That is what percent of the tenant farmers in the country? It is less than one-half of 1 percent. To be exact it is .47 of 1 percent. On page 960 of the 1939 hearings Mr. Alexander stated:

It will take $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 a year to alleviate this condition.

Mr. KEEFE. That is for 20 or 25 years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. This does not inspire an increase in farm prices.

Secondly, we are saving up a problem for future generations. You make a loan for 40 years to a man who is 40 years old now and he will have to live to be 80 years old to pay it off. It is not likely that many of them will live that long. Then what? You throw it into an estate. Then what? Oh, somebody will come along and the farm which Uncle Sam financed will certainly revert to tenancy again.

What was the experience of South Dakota in connection with farm-tenancy loans? Mr. Chairman, this is not a new subject. They tried making rural loans in South Dakota. How much did that State lose? It lost over $30,000,000 on a rather short experiment in that field. Now, we were addressing ourselves to 2,800,000 tenant farmers in the country and we are washing out less than one-half of 1 percent of the loans a year; meanwhile the number is increasing over and above the number to whom we can give farms with Federal funds by about 40,000 a year, on the basis of their own figures. It just does not make sense.

Mr. Chairman, the average size of these farms is 134 acres, average loan $5,395, and there have been 4 percent defaults in the number of borrowers.

Some borrowers have paid ahead so that the moneys that have been paid are probably 160 percent of maturities, but 4 percent of the number of borrowers are in default. Are we solving the problem when we are wrestling here with cash out of the Federal Treasury in order to effect parity and an appreciation in prices if we then launch out in a farm-tenancy program? And one of the conditions of that loan is that the borrower has to be a cooperator.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Of course, that figure of 4 percent is high. At the present time, I understand, they have only 3 cases out of 145 on which payments have come due and are in default. This is an amazingly small percentage. That problem has been a long time developing, and apparently the program is working to date. Would the gentleman knock the baby in the head because it could not walk the first day? I may say to the gentleman that we introduced the bill with from a billion to two billion dollar program, but we found here this criticism: "Why go into that large an expenditure until you have tried it out and seen how it works? Why not start on a small scale?" So we started in a modest manner. We are not going to solve that problem in 1 year. If the gentleman had a chance as I did to go into a number of different districts and investigate the individual farms that have been purchased, he would find that in the main this program has been working in a very remarkable way.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me say to the gentleman that I experience a complete sense of frustration when I think that we will make 4,000, 5,000, or 7,000 loans in a year, and meanwhile there are 40,000 other people who are sliding into tenancy, so that we are taking one step up and dropping four steps down.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I agree that when one first looks at it it looks that way, but we first started out with only a $10,000,000 appropriation and that was gradually increased.

We are now having hearings on a measure which we hope to report out soon that would parallel the Federal housing method and broaden and expand this. If you break down the machinery, it breaks down the chance really to solve this problem.

The gentleman talks about 40 years. In Denmark, where a program such as this succeeded better than anywhere else, they have a 60-year program. If you give a man a chance to work toward daylight on home ownership, you have given him something to work for, and such programs have worked in nearly every country in which they have been tried. I do not know how it worked in South Dakota, nor do I know what their method was, but in nearly all the countries where they have tried it they have worked out a program and are holding onto their program, not abandoning it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is nothing complicated about the method they used out there. You just loan a man money and say to him, "These are the conditions under which you can get yourself a farm," and it failed.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not willing to concede that we cannot succeed at all when a great many other countries have succeeded.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman says we go ahead one step and then go back two.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I did not say anything about going back two steps. That is what the gentleman from Illinois thinks we are doing.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman has said the progress is that way. I suggest that the boy tried to get to school. He said he could not get there; that he went forward one step and went back two. They asked him how he finally got there. He said he turned around and started for home.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I hope the gentleman does not believe that by denying the tenant the right to secure a home he will enable that tenant to start home. How can he start home when he has no home? What we are trying to do is to start the tenant home.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; it proceeds on the assumption—and probably an unwarranted assumption—first, that tenancy is all wrong. I can show you lots of tenants who would not swap. I will show you acreage out there in our country that is administered on a tenancy basis where the tenant is infinitely better off as a tenant than as an owner. We start on an unwarranted assumption.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman does not mean that. The gentleman may mean a condition prevails, but the gentleman recognizes that there is nothing worth more to the country than home ownership on an average-sized farm.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; but the idea of addressing ourselves to a farm-tenancy program when we are going to make only a few loans compared to the total number of tenant farmers.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman realizes that there are 30 applications for loans for every case where the tenant gets the money?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; there are nearly 30 applications and is it any wonder when we give such largesse out of the Federal Treasury? Who would not go up to the bowl and get his share of porridge?

Mr. JONES of Texas. There is no largesse in this.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me address myself now to this question of the liquidation of resettlement projects, and I want the gentleman from Texas to hear this because here again we got into this high, exalted idea that we ought to go out and dot the countryside with resettlement projects and subsistence homesteads. In the first place it cost $1,500,000 to administer the liquidation. There are 160 of these projects that are being administered by the Farm Security Administration as a sort of successor in trust to the old, defaulted Resettlement Administration under the benign guidance of our cherished and distinguished friend, Dr. Rexford Guy Tugwell. After the good doctor got that all built and got the taxpayer's dough invested he left the Government and got himself a job elsewhere. So the liquidation is one of the responsibilities of the Farm Security Administration. In addition to the projects, they built some auxiliary factories, like hosiery mills and garment factories and wood-working factories. Up to the 1st of December 1939 they had liquidated 15 of these projects. The 15 cost the taxpayers $3,551,000. Now, did we get that much out of them when they were sold?

Mr. EATON. And the worst one was in New Jersey.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me tell you what they got. They got $2,006,000. So in the first 15 we have lost $1,038,000. They have got 1 down in Alabama that cost $1,038,000 and it was sold for $194,000. Yes, out of the great benevolence of our collective hearts we were going to scatter these great bits of masonry over the country and let losses fall on the taxpayers. We were going to be good to everybody at the expense of the taxpayer.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DIRKSEN. So we built the Alabama project for $1,038,000 and we got $194,000 back, which reminds me of the fellow who sold suits below cost and when someone asked him how he could do it, he said, "Well, it is because I can sell so many of them." [Laughter.] I suppose by that logic the more of these things you have built and on which you lose seven or eight hundred percent, the more solvent the Federal Treasury will become.

Now, my notion about that is that the liquidation of the resettlement projects ought to be turned over to the United States Housing Authority, or it ought to be turned over to the Federal Housing Administration. That is the proper place for it, and not in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I agree with the gentleman that the project buildings were a mistake, and when the Committee on Agriculture reported the bill under which this farm-tenancy program is working we forbade the construction of any more of those projects and provided for the financing of individual homes. Now, it is true that the Federal Housing Administration has been doing some work, but they are not equipped to do this type of work, and they found they were unable to handle it because they have a different method of approach. However, the new bill we have under consideration and which we expect to hitch onto this one does follow the Federal housing plan, and I think gives great promise of effective work. I hope the gentleman will not fight to do away with the program before it has had a chance to prove itself, especially when it is working so well up to date.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have one rule, I will say to my good friend from Texas. I think the first and foremost responsibility of the Congress of the United States is to make a heroic effort for the people of the country to approximate a balanced budget.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Now, every man must have for himself a formula for determining whether an expenditure is justified or not in marching toward a balanced budget, and the only formula I have is whether or not the matter is indispensable or whether we could best back off from it for a while rather than use borrowed funds for the carrying on of that kind of function of government. Weighed, I believe, by that formula, we can just as well go along with the overwhelming sentiment of the Appropriations Committee this morning and leave that $25,000,000 in limbo for a year or two, or until we can determine how far we are going to go to escape the requirements which the President has placed upon us—that there must be new taxes if we are going to expand.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the Budget Bureau, when it sent the item to us, lopped off $15,000,000. I do not know what the reason was, but I would say offhand that when they capriciously took $15,000,000 off of an expenditure of $40,000,000 they certainly did not evaluate it on the side of indispensability, or they would have insisted on the full amount of $40,000,000; but they did not do that. They said, "You can get along with $25,000,000," and after we went into it, we said, "You will get along with nothing," and I hope that the Congress of the United States will support the full committee in taking that viewpoint.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that I have no objection to making the regular amount of reduction, but does not the gentleman think that when he takes the entire activity and reduces it 47 percent—and I have had the secretary of the committee figure that—it is going a little strong; and when he takes an organization that has been 3 years building up and makes it impossible for it to function at all, and practically destroys the activity, that that is pretty strong action for a committee to take without going into it pretty fairly?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The logic of it is this: If your wife sent you to the grocery store with a $5 bill and gave you a list and you find there are twice as many items as you can buy with the $5, there are two ways that you can go about it. You can buy half the amount of each and thin it out. If you follow that philosophy, you will have inefficient administration. Or you can eliminate some of the items entirely, and I believe that is the way to get to a balanced Budget.

Mr. JONES of Texas. You would not spend it all for meat and nothing for vegetables?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. EDMISTON). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. IZAC. I do not want to break in on the gentleman's thought about farm parity and these other matters, but I did want to break in earlier when he was talking about when we are going to have a change in the type of government in this country. It is not going to be due to a handful of Communists or subversive agents that some foreign government plants in this country, but it is going to be due to the one-third of our people who are ill-clothed, ill-housed, and ill-fed. I would like to have the gentleman reiterate that that is his own idea.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But let me add one thing to it if the House will indulge me just a moment. I remember standing in the bridgehead in Germany in 1918. I had been a courier from Uncle Sam's general headquarters up to Cologne. I could attune my ear and hear the machine guns on the homes, on tops of buildings in the town of Dusseldorf, Germany, and what were they doing? They were mowing down their own citizens. I said to myself, "It is impossible. There is solidity of character about that type of people that would not permit them to go that far. They will not get off of their base." But despite all those attributes of character they were mowing down their own citizens. Why? Because of despair, because of hunger, because of desperation. Was it because they were subversive? Was it because they were lacking in devotion to their country, to their ideals, their traditions, and their culture? Oh, no. It was bitterness and despair of the conditions that made them do it, and to cut down their own citizens.

May I say to my friend, I am much concerned about these problems, as much as anybody. So I want to subordinate my partisanship in the hope that, in pursuance of the general welfare, we will find the answer, because therein we are going to find a major share of the answer to this farm problem. Take 9,000,000 families, instead of having to live on soup bones and cheap cuts, they might go into a butcher shop and lay down a dollar bill and say, "Give me a dollar's worth of pork chops." That is the kind of stuff that registers way out there in the Corn Belt, where we have the problem of low lard prices, and low corn prices, and all that sort of thing. So much of the solution is bound up in finding the remedy for the problem of unemployment and its twin sister, relief.

Mr. IZAC. And therefore we had better turn our attention to the solving of that problem, does not the gentleman think?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Of course, that is the central problem we have to solve. But let me ask the gentleman whether the argument which he made a while ago, when he was speaking about the restriction of production, is not an argument in favor of the expansion of the Surplus Commodities Corporation stamp plan of enabling people to consume so-called "surpluses" of our agricultural crops? Does he not think that he was really making an argument in favor of that plan?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Maybe we can; maybe we cannot; but it is scratching the surface. We are not going anywhere as far as the whole problem is concerned.

Now, before I get through, having talked about unemployment and relief, it would be unfair to develop a thesis without having an answer for it, and I think there is an answer. That answer is just this: No less a person than Governor Eccles, of the Federal Reserve Board, said last Monday that employment depends upon private enterprise. Well, it is an old remedy, but it is a true remedy. It is an old problem, and it is going to take an old-fashioned remedy. It reminds me of the young wife who called in the doctor for the baby. The doctor punched the baby around a little and finally he says, "Now, my dear, you give the baby some castor oil." She was one of these ritzy young mothers, and she said, "But, Doctor, castor oil is such an old-fashioned thing." The doctor says, "I know; but babies are such old-fashioned things." [Laughter.]

This is an old-fashioned problem, and it takes an old-fashioned remedy. But what is the remedy? The remedy will be found in the expansion of private enterprise and in the encouragement of venture capital into new fields of enterprise.

Now, what is the score? When Jerome Frank was before the committee in connection with the Securities and Exchange Commission I had him put into the hearings on the independent offices appropriation bill a statement showing the amount of new money each year that had been spent in private enterprise.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

I also assembled some figures from the Financial Chronicle to see how the last few years compared with prior years in the amount of new enterprise capital invested.

What is the answer about new capital and new enterprises? Let me give you the high spots.

In 1929 we were up to $8,600,000,000, not of refunding capital or refinancing capital but new capital. In 1930 we were down to $4,900,000,000.

How much was it in 1933? One hundred and sixty-one million dollars; a little drop in the bucket for new enterprises. It got up to $1,115,000,000 in 1937. In the first 5 months of 1939 it was back to $179,000,000. There, Mr. Chairman, is the answer to our problem.

Mr. Chairman, I like to go back to Scripture once in a while. You read somewhere in St. Matthew about the householder who had a vineyard. He went into the market place, saw men idle, and hired them. He went again, saw more men idle, and hired them. Then the Scripture said that in the eleventh hour he went into the market place and there saw more men idle. He said unto them, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" And one with more temerity than the rest stood forth and said, "Because no man hath hired us."

That is the answer to the unemployment program. Who has not hired them? Those who could if there were any encouragement for new-venture capital to find its way into the establishment of new enterprises. How could this be done? A little encouraging word from your President and mine to the business element in the country would go a long way toward finding new jobs so that these people might earn and help us dispose of the farm surplus of the country.

When all is said and done, there are but two employers in our land—one is business and the other is Government. Government cannot hire all the unemployed and remain solvent. Hence we must go back to business, industry, and enterprise. If private enterprise is to take up the unemployment slack, there must be some incentive for it to do so.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Before the gentleman yields the floor, I wish he would give us some insight into the reasoning of the committee which led them to eliminate the provision necessary to carry out the Sugar Act of 1937.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me say to the gentleman, first, that when it came before the committee in December—or in January, I believe it was—the quotas had been lifted by Presidential proclamation. Several factors were involved. The second one is that the Sugar Act expires in December 1940, if I remember correctly. The third is that the Supreme Court of the United States killed the processing taxes on every other basic commodity, but we are still collecting $68,000,000 in excise taxes from sugar consumers of the country. The fourth reason is that there is dissatisfaction in the administration of the Sugar Act of 1937, and they are not agreed at all as to what the Congress ought to do.

The Secretary of Agriculture has indicated time and time again that sugar is an inefficient industry and that it ought to be destroyed. If it ought to be destroyed, then I am willing to give it the coup de grace right now instead of spending additional millions of dollars.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Does the gentleman realize that the tax on the sugar grower is still retained?

Mr. DIRKSEN. But that matter can easily be taken care of by the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, if the ills of the American farmer could be solved by words, I know of no one better qualified to act as specialist in administering the treatment than our genial friend from Illinois. I have listened to him carefully for 60 minutes. He gave to himself every minute of time permissible under the rules of the House for one Member of the House to consume. I judged from his remarks that he is very much dissatisfied both with the machinery of the existing farm program and with the execution of that program; and also that he is very greatly dissatisfied because of the condition of the American farmer. After consuming most of the time during which he addressed the House in a discussion of his criticisms of the things that he contends are wrong, he did make some reference in the concluding part of his speech to what he suggested might be the remedy, stating that it would, in his judgment, be unfair to enter upon the extensive criticisms he voiced without at the same time suggesting some remedy.

What remedy does he suggest? I want you to go back over his remarks mentally and find the things to which he made reference as remedies. First, he referred to a facetious way to the old-fashioned remedy of castor oil. I do not assume, of course, that he desires to administer that to the American farmer. That gentleman is suffering enough already from dysentery of the tongue on the part of some politicians.

His next remedy is the balancing of the Budget. Of course, I am as heartily in favor of balancing the Budget as he is, and I think my record on that question may favorably compare with his, because I have voted against the making of approximately $15,000,000,000 of appropriations which have been made since 1933. The question here involved is of more importance even than the balancing of the National Budget. It is a question of undertaking to bring about some balance of the budget of the American farmer, and I respectfully submit that no suggestion of the gentleman could by any stretch of the imagination be construed to relate to the solution of that problem.

His comments with regard to providing more capital for private enterprise are not applicable in any way to the farm problem, although they might possibly be applicable to the problems of industry and the unemployment situation. The problems of the American farmer cannot be solved by oratory. If that could be done, he would be riding today on the crest of a wave of great prosperity. What we need to have done, if it can be done, is that those who have been so liberal in the use of their words of sympathy for his condition and in their criticism of what is being done for him may, when the opportunity is afforded them translate those words into acts. The only way you can translate words into acts in an effort to aid the condition of the American farmer today in connection with this bill is by making appropriations in his behalf which have been authorized by law. You cannot legislate in an appropriation bill. If a new program should be embarked upon by legislation which would substitute other procedure for that which now exists under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 perhaps it may or may not be more satisfactory in helping the agricultural population of the country. I did not vote for the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. A great many of those who are opposing some of the appropriations which have been carried in this bill in the past, such as parity payments, did support that legislation, which impliedly promised parity payments. I would like to see other and improved legislation substituted for the farm program which now exists, but I know and you know it is not worth while to talk of that now and that if we do not use the machinery of that program now in an effort to help the American farmer there is absolutely nothing that can be done.

As a member of the subcommittee which reported this appropriation bill to the House, I dislike very much to create the impression that there was dissension among the membership of the committee as to what should be the terms of the bill. In the main I may say that we were in substantial accord, but there are certain matters which are contained in the bill, or which have been eliminated from the bill, that I must discuss; otherwise I would feel that I am recreant in my duty, not only to my constituents but to the membership of this House.

First, I want you to take notice of exactly what has been done to the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. Those appropriations for the present fiscal year are $1,185,115,315. They were reduced by the Budget estimates to $780,924,519—a reduction of $404,190,796. They have been further reduced by the action of your subcommittee on agricultural appropriations and the subsequent action of the full committee by the amount of $154,530,263, which makes the bill for the next fiscal year, as reported to the House, approximately $626,000,000, as against approximately $1,200,000,000 for the present fiscal year. The exact cut below the figure of last year is 47 and a fraction percent.

As I have said, I am in favor of economy—that is, reasonable economy—but in view of the admittedly distressed condition of the agricultural population of this country, I can think of no justification for making the farmer the goat in this Budget-balancing program which is being carried on and as against very much smaller reductions made in the appropriations for other departments, cutting the Department of Agriculture activities and benefits to be received through its activities by the farmers of the country by approximately 47 and a fraction percent. Of course, I realize that one of the major items in that reduction has been the elimination of parity payments. I do not know if it would be possible at this time, even if the subcommittee had been authorized under the rule adopted by the full committee to report it, to secure the approval of the parity appropriation by the membership of this House. I hope that later it may be possible to carry into effect that provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, at least in time for necessary appropriations to be made for the 1941 crops. The 1940 crops were provided for in last year's bill.

I call your attention to the fact that this question of rising farm prices and whether or not they will continue ought not to be decisive of our action in determining whether or not parity payments should be provided in this bill. There is no assurance they will rise to parity. You have been told by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], chairman of the subcommittee having jurisdiction of this bill, and I am sure you agree with him in this particular, of the probable effects of an early conclusion of the European war upon our agriculture and of the disastrous drop in farm prices which may reasonably be expected immediately after the conclusion of that war. Nobody knows whether it will have been concluded before the expiration of the next fiscal year or not. One thing we do know and that is if we make parity appropriations in this bill under the same restrictions as the parity payments which have been carried in preceding bills, they cannot be used to make parity payments to farmers if the prices of the farmers' products shall have risen in 1941 to 75 percent or more of parity. In other words, if the anticipated increase in the prices of farm products comes about, if there is no necessity during the next fiscal year for making any payments to the farmer in order to bring his prices up; not to parity, but to 75 percent of parity, then not one single dollar of parity appropriations, if made in this bill, would be expended.

I agree with one argument—I believe that the President of the United States is absolutely correct in his insistence that the Congress should make provision by appropriate legislation for financing this farm program in some way other than from the general funds in the Treasury of the United States. I hope the fact that these parity payments have been eliminated for the time being, at least, from the pending bill may serve as a spur to the Committee on Agriculture and to the Committee on Ways and Means to devise and report to this House some legislation of a permanent character which will enable us to finance the farm program in some other way than by general appropriations from the Public Treasury, which cannot be indefinitely continued.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I take it that the gentleman may be suggesting a processing tax as a means of financing the program. May I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under the sugar legislation that was passed recently a processing tax was established, and the growers are now paying that processing tax? Under the present bill, however, the appropriation for carrying out the provisions of that act has been eliminated entirely and, as a consequence, the growers who are now paying the processing tax on sugar beets and sugarcane will get no returns whatever this fall.

Mr. TARVER. I am not undertaking to suggest to the able members of the Committee on Agriculture what they should do, but they could report to the House a bill substantially the same as the old Agricultural Adjustment Act which was outlawed by the Supreme Court and which would probably now be upheld by that tribunal.

That legislation, of course, if reenacted by Congress, would provide for the levying of processing taxes. I am simply pointing out that the President's position, to my mind, is unassailable, and that it seems to me to be the duty of the appropriate legislative committee or committees of the House to provide by legislation reported to this body for some permanent source of revenue to continue this farm program.

With reference to the Sugar Act, may I say to the gentleman that I had expected to discuss it later if I had sufficient time to do so? I do not come from a sugar-producing area, but I may say for the benefit of the gentleman that I was one member of the subcommittee who was not convinced that it was advisable to eliminate the appropriation for the Sugar Act of 1937 at this time, and I did not vote so to eliminate it.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that the testimony in connection with the appropriation to carry out the sugar legislation was taken on December 6, at which time the quotas had been lifted, and as a consequence the committee did not, perhaps, have full knowledge of the fact that by Executive order the quotas had been reestablished?

Mr. TARVER. Of course, the gentleman will not place on me the burden of explaining the reasons which actuated other members of the committee when I have stated to him that I entertain a contrary opinion.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman has expressed the hope that the Committee on Agriculture would bring out legislation to provide a means of paying these appropriations. There seems to be a very grave doubt in the minds of many with regard to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture to propose a money-raising bill. They seem to feel that the Committee on Ways and Means should begin a study of that question.

Mr. TARVER. May I say to the gentleman, who I know is deeply interested in this problem, that I believe, while I do not claim to be an authority on parliamentary law, that any legislation which involves principally the question of raising taxes would necessarily go to the Committee on Ways and Means, but legislation which deals generally with the farm problem and which only incidentally involves the question of raising revenue is properly referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The old, original Agricultural Adjustment Act went to the gentleman's committee, and there is no reason, in my judgment, why legislation similar to that should not be reported from his committee.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. The legislation to which the gentleman refers would be primarily for the purpose of raising revenue. Does not the gentleman believe such a bill should come from the Committee on Ways and Means, and not the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. TARVER. I do not agree that it would be primarily for the purpose of raising revenue. In my humble judgment, the existing farm program needs correction and revision. The proposed bill may very well involve extensive proposals in connection with the revision of the existing Agricultural Adjustment Act, the act of 1938, and therefore would go to the gentleman's committee instead of to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Now, may I pass on, because there are two or three other parts of the bill to which I desire to make some brief reference.

I believe the elimination of the farm-tenant land-purchase appropriation in this bill was absolutely unjustified and was an attempted destruction of a program which has been of very considerable benefit to a part of the farm-tenant population of the United States, who comprise 2,800,000 farmers. About the only objection there is to the program now is that the objectors believe it is not extensive enough to reach a considerable number of the tenant farmers, the idea seeming to be that because you cannot help all the tenant farmers you should not help any of them. Originally the principal ground of objection was that the tenant farmers would not pay back the money and therefore we were just giving them largesse from the Treasury of the United States, and it was an inexcusable waste of public funds.

Now, it comes down to the point where only three of the large number mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] in his colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] a few moments ago are in arrears at all on their payments. The total amount of repayments exceeds by a considerable sum the amount of obligations to repay now due; in other words, the Government is not going to lose anything on this program as it is being carried on at present, and therefore little, if any, stress is laid by its opponents on its being a waste of public funds.

There was considerable discussion in the subcommittee on agricultural appropriations with regard to suggesting to the appropriate officials of the Government that this program should be financed in future on a larger scale through the securing of loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation just as it is proposed to finance the R. E. A. by securing loans in the amount of $40,000,000 for the next fiscal year.

These loans are just as safe, just as certain of repayment, just as much of an investment for the benefit of the American people as are the R. E. A. loans. The fact that the program is being carried on only in a small way is not only not an argument for its abandonment but is argument for its expansion. The amount authorized for the next fiscal year is $50,000,000, and certainly there is absolutely no justification for the proposed cutting below the amount of $25,000,000 approved by the Budget and, in fact, the elimination of the activity altogether. Of course, gentlemen who come from sections of the country where the farm-tenancy problem is not very grave perhaps do not realize just the situation in sections where 70 percent of the farmers are farm tenants. We held out to them some 2 or 3 years ago, when we passed the Bankhead-Jones Act, some little ray of hope that those who were industrious, those who showed that they were honest and would repay their debt, those who showed that they were capable farmers, might eventually obtain a small loan from the Government by which they might purchase for themselves homes; and a small number of them have been able to do it. I am sorry that the number has not been greater, but in the long run it will not cost the United States Government anything, and if it has brought happiness to even a small number of tenant families in this country who would not otherwise have been able to own their homes, I feel we have been justified in the support that we have been able to give to this program, and I earnestly hope that the House may reverse the action of the full committee and at least reinsert the $25,000,000 which was approved for this purpose by the Budget. Talk about this being of small benefit and just a scratch on the surface. The first appropriation for rural free delivery in the United States was only $10,000, and objections were made against it then on the idea that they could serve only a few of the millions of farmers in the United States, and that it was absolutely useless to try to institute such a program, and yet from that small beginning there has grown today a Rural Free Delivery Service which touches almost the entire agricultural population of the country.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. Is it not a fact, so far as the gentleman knows, that the farm-purchase program is the only part of the attempted relief program which does not cost and will not cost the Government a single dollar in the long run; in other words, it is self-supporting, is it not?

Mr. TARVER. I would not say that it is the only part of the program which is self-supporting, but I will say to the gentleman that, in my judgment, it is self-supporting, and, instead of being a waste of Government funds, it constitutes a wise investment.

There are certain other items in the bill which I thought ought not to have been eliminated. Some of them are items that are not of any interest to the section of the country which I represent.

Let me refer, first, to the Budget estimate of $500,000 for water facilities for arid or semiarid lands. Not one single dollar of that, if it had been included in the bill, would have been expended within a thousand miles of my congressional district, but I have heard considerable evidence from time to time as to the value of the work done under that appropriation, and which is being done today, and no justification was advanced in the hearings before my subcommittee for the elimination by the subcommittee of the Budget estimate of one-half million dollars, and I certainly hope that the House, upon further consideration of the matter, may see fit to restore it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. I certainly appreciate the gentleman's statement about water facilities and I wish to say that the possibility has just been started of really developing water facilities for small units to individual farmers, most of the money being loaned, and they have done a fine job and I hope the gentleman's amendment, if he offers it, will prevail.

Mr. TARVER. I have no intention of offering an amendment, because I do not come from that section of the country, but I shall support such an amendment if it is offered.

There was an item in the Budget for $603,000 for combating what is known as the white-fringed beetle, one of the most destructive pests which has ever operated in our country. The Committee did not vote to eliminate that item from the bill, it was eliminated upon a point of order, the chairman of the subcommittee taking the position that no authority of law exists for the making of the appropriation. I was under the impression, and still am, that legislation passed by Congress two or three years ago authorizing the making of appropriations to combat grasshoppers, mormon crickets, and other pests of that character would be sufficient authorization for the making of an appropriation of this kind, but the chairman of the subcommittee entertained a contrary view. Certainly, it will be disastrous to a very large area along the Gulf coast—it does not touch my congressional district immediately—if the Senate does not restore this appropriation which, as I have said, is backed up by a Budget estimate.

You have already heard of the action which has been taken with regard to the projected appropriation for surplus commodities. I do not think that any money appropriated by Congress has been more usefully expended or expended in a way more calculated to be helpful to the farmers of the country and also to the low-income families of the country than the money which has been provided for surplus-commodities purchase and distribution to low-income families.

However, with regard to that item, the subcommittee was absolutely powerless. The law only makes a permanent appropriation of 30 percent of the tariff receipts for that purpose. There is no authorization of law for an appropriation by Congress in addition to that 30-percent proportion. So that if any amount is included in this bill for surplus commodities it must be added by the Senate, after which the House may concur in the Senate's position if it should see proper.

I feel that among the other activities which this administration has been responsible for and which have been of very great benefit, are the submarginal land activities; that is, the land utilization projects. I say that as a resident of a section of the country where very little of that money has been or will be spent. I am being guided by evidence which has from time to time been submitted to our subcommittee as to the value of the work which has been done. The Department asked for $10,000,000 for this purpose. They wanted to carry on substantially the same program that they have this year. They were cut down to $1,000,000 by the Budget.

Dr. D. S. Myer, of the Soil Conservation Service, testified before our subcommittee, and I trust you will read his evidence in the hearings, that in many of these submarginal land units they have purchased tracts of land which are not connected and that it is absolutely necessary, in order that there be orderly control or management of these units, that they be permitted to purchase the intervening tracts, so as to combine all of the lands in connection with one project into one body. He said that without starting any additional projects whatever, but solely for the purpose of making purchase of lands dividing tracts that have already been acquired, there would be necessary for the next fiscal year $5,000,000 in addition to the amount approved by the Budget. The subcommittee did not make provision for that. However, the subcommittee did add approximately $1,000,000 to the amount carried in the bill for submarginal land purchases.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I think the Congress voted about $10,000,000 a couple of years ago for submarginal-land purposes, primarily for the purpose of trying to connect these purchases together, but in my section of the country that money was not used for that purpose, and I think the committee did well in cutting it down.

Mr. TARVER. It might be possible that in the gentleman's section of the country expenditures have not been conducted with the same care that they have been in other sections. I am advised that in some sections of the country at least, I think practically everywhere unless in the gentleman's locality, discretion has been used in the management of these matters, and there has not been any general complaint of the character which the gentleman voices at this time.

I have taken all the time of the House which I feel justified in consuming. I want to repeat that in my judgment the drastic cut here of 47 percent below the appropriation for the present fiscal year for the Department of Agriculture is unjustified, and to express the hope that it may be restored either by this House or by the Senate, not to the full amount appropriated last year, because I do think that certain economies can be effected without injury to the Department or its activities and I voted for them in committee; but certainly to an amount which will not place an undue, disproportionate burden upon the farmers of the United States, who have certainly suffered to a greater extent than any other element in our population because of depression conditions which have existed during the last several years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman's informative address. I had hoped that he would touch on several other very serious cuts which, in my judgment, if permitted to stand, will do a great injustice to the farmers of the United States. I wonder if the gentleman would be kind enough to discuss the reduction that has been made in the appropriation for the administration of organized soil-conservation districts. Last year there was more than $4,000,000 appropriated for that purpose. That one item has been cut more than one-half for the ensuing year. This reduction, if permitted to stand, will make it impossible for many districts heretofore organized and approved to function because of the lack of sufficient funds.

Mr. TARVER. That is a cut which, in the judgment of the committee and in the judgment of myself, was justified under present conditions. I cannot agree with the gentleman as to its effect. I think we all agree that it is necessary to exercise all of the economy possible in an effort to bring about an adjustment between our national revenue and our national expenditures, and to do this we must cut some things we would like to see untouched. I am heartily cooperating with those who are trying to bring about that adjustment; while I deplore unreasoning economy, at the same time I do think that some of these worth-while activities ought to be willing to stand a reasonable cut in an effort to bring about a financial balance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry as to whether or not it is planned to continue the debate over tomorrow. This is a rather important bill and the hearings were extensive, and the bill was not made available to any of the Members of the House until today at 12 o'clock. Many of us have not had an opportunity to read it. I was wondering if these gentlemen were not going to permit general debate to run over tomorrow.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The committee is proceeding under directions from the House that general debate be continued for the day. Tomorrow is Calendar Wednesday, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has the call and I am informed will call up a bill for consideration by the House. We will, however, resume consideration of this bill at the close of Calendar Wednesday business.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then will there be further general debate? The gentleman is in position to know whether there will be. Many of us have not had a chance to get any data together, for we did not know with what we were going to be confronted. It seems to me that general debate ought to run over Thursday. The gentleman is in position to give us some information on that, I believe.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we must, of course, dispose of the bill by Thursday night.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Why is that true?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I shall be glad to give the gentleman from Texas, to whom we always listen with pleasure and profit, or anyone whom he may suggest, all the time he may require. I shall be pleased to recognize the gentleman now, if he desires time, for 20 minutes, 30 minutes, or 1 hour.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would much prefer to have time tomorrow, not knowing until today at noon what was going to happen. The subcommittee and the main committee have taken, and I think properly so, 2 or 3 months to get this matter ready, but they throw it at us at 12 o'clock with all its implications, and while I want to talk a little and express some of my feelings about this, still when a man has not had a chance to read the bill it is very difficult for him to present his argument, for he has to take a lot of statements simply on faith. I would rather do it the other way. If there is to be no further debate, if we are going to be backed up against the wall and face the firing squad within 2 days after the bill is reported, then I have no other choice but to take time this afternoon.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, no one here, of course, can say how long general debate will continue, because we are proceeding under the orders of the House. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that if general debate is continued tomorrow I shall be glad to give the gentleman any time at my command.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois how many applications for time they have on this bill?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I have few applications. Five Members have asked for a total of 1 hour and 15 minutes. With the requests now pending with me we could complete general debate tonight.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have requests for about 2 hours' time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I resent this action of bringing in a bill that is cut half in two, practically—a 47-percent reduction—with a proposal to close general debate before the Members have had a chance to read the bill. I protest any such procedure.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I believe it ought to be said that we are following the regular procedure. The gentleman speaks as if this were extraordinary.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then I protest the regular procedure. I protest the habit of the Appropriations Committee's withholding all information as to what items are in a bill until they report it to the House and then go immediately into its consideration. I protest that. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes up regularly year after year. It has come up ever since the gentleman has been a Member of this House.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I protest a continuous procedure of this kind. It is wrong.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The newspapers of the city have carried from day to day practically verbatim a report of the changes made in this bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, no; they have not. I have asked the gentleman from Missouri, I have asked every member on the Democratic side of this committee, and some on the Republican side, what the bill contained, and they said they were under orders not to disclose any information; and I could not get any accurate information. I have had newspapermen ask me what the bill was, and I had to say that I had no idea. That is what they got from these gentlemen, too.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The newspapers have carried accurate reports on the bill. We could not, of course, report those things which came up at the last minute. The item to which the gentleman refers in particular is one which none of us could anticipate, which by a vote of 26 to 5, I believe, was eliminated by the whole committee this morning. That action could not be foreseen.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am not protesting the action of the subcommittee. I have a high regard for the gentleman from Missouri. I am not protesting the action of the subcommittee, for they are complying with the custom and probably with instructions from their full committee; but I want to take this occasion to make the statement that I believe, in all fairness to the other Members of the House, the Appropriations Committee should adopt the custom of reporting a bill and waiting at least 2 or 3 days before it is taken up because there are items in this bill—it is not just one item that we are interested in; there are many items—that different Members are interested in; and, in all fairness, the men who represent different sections of the country should have an opportunity to study the bill before they are called upon to act on it. A bill should be reported and, unless there is grave emergency, 2 or 3 days should intervene before it is called up to give the Members a chance to become informed of the contents of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, let me say, in response to my friend from Texas, that these bills are stereotyped—that the same items come up under exactly the same circumstances year after year; and anyone who has been a Member of this House during that time, and especially anyone who has paid attention to agricultural legislation and the appropriation bills, can surmise that any particular item will be there again, either pro or con, with either an increase or a decrease.

These items come up every year. All of them have been reported here repeatedly, and it is merely a question of whether the committee will vote them up or down. It is merely a question of amounts, with no change in the merits involved. Any gentleman here can tell now what will be in the agricultural bill next year except as to amounts.

Mr. JONES of Texas. There are hundreds of items in here. A man cannot carry around a library on the assumption that every item is going to be changed, and he has to be ready for every item. It is just wrong, that is all.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri if it is not his intention and if he is not willing to give liberal time for general debate on this bill?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes. We always give liberal time.

Mr. RAYBURN. If it is determined at the close of today that liberal debate has not been had and that Members have not had an opportunity to be heard, who are in position, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is, of course, to know something about these matters, then would it not be possible to extend general debate for a time tomorrow?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes. May I say again, as I stated before, if the time is extended I will recognize the gentleman. I will be glad to yield him 10 minutes, 30 minutes, or an hour now. These items in which he is interested have been before the House repeatedly, and they have been discussed for years. If the gentleman is unprepared at this time, which is a very remarkable situation, he may speak later.

Mr. PACE. Why is it necessary to finish this bill Thursday night?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. On what does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] predicate his statement that we cannot debate this bill on Thursday or Friday?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The program adopted by the House leadership and by the Committee on Appropriations is to bring in an appropriation bill every Tuesday and debate it during the entire legislative week. We debate the bills, dispose of them, and get them out of the way at the rate of one each week. That has been done week after week during this present session and in all previous sessions. In order to dispose of the legislative program it is necessary to dispose of one appropriation bill a week and that is all we are asking here.

Mr. MASSINGALE. The gentleman made the statement that he had not had any requests for time. The gentleman knows it is absurd for a Member not a member of the committee to think that he can get any time until the committee has exhausted all of the time it wants; therefore, I am sure a number of people who are interested in this have not even thought of asking for time because they knew it would not be possible to get it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Happily, that is not the situation. Out of the five men to whom I have yielded time only one is a member of the committee. Anyone who applies may have time.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am talking about the ordinary procedure.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Any Member may have all the time he wants. I have given everyone who applied all the time he requested.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman agree that general debate will run over until tomorrow and through tomorrow?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We are proceeding under the orders of the House.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman agree not to make a motion to close debate before tomorrow night? Will the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We never move to close debate. It is always done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman agree he will not make a motion?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I have never made a motion to close general debate in my life.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask for the regular order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Why cannot this general debate continue and be concluded on Friday?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It has been customary to adjourn over the week end.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will general debate continue until Friday night?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is a matter to be taken up with the House leadership.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has adequate time to give to those who want to discuss this bill, and I am sure if I do not finish in my 10 minutes he will be glad to give me additional time.

Mr. Chairman, we heard the gentleman from Missouri today make the rather startling statement which summarized would mean that all the efforts at farm legislation under this administration had accomplished very little. In reality I know that if the present farm bill were submitted to a vote of the farmers, the great majority of them would vote in favor of the existing legislation. Certainly it has fundamentals that must be contained in any successful farm legislation. No. 1 is control and No. 2 is the machinery to pay the farmer the difference between what he gets for his products and what he is actually entitled to. If the gentleman from Missouri was so anxious to give the farmer the parity prices he tells us the farmer is entitled to, certainly he could have followed the fine example he set for the House the last time an agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration and urge an appropriation for parity payments this year.

Soil conservation during the last 7 years, a subject neglected by this Nation until with the aid of modern machinery we have accomplished more toward destroying the natural fertility and our greatest natural resource, the productivity of the soil, has made the first steps toward stopping the complete destruction of the productivity of our greatest natural resource, the soil of this Nation. Certainly you cannot say that the present farm legislation is not the first that has recognized the need of this Nation to take stock of its resources and make an attempt to preserve the productivity of the soil of this country for future generations. Any time you hear an advocate of letting the farmer produce all he desires to produce you hear an advocate of the destruction of our natural resources and of the export at a loss of our greatest natural asset, our soil. Certainly an attempt has been made under the present bill to limit the production of the farmer somewhat in line with the production of this Nation and our prospective exports, and when you exceed that you are urging the Nation to deplete its resources and say to future generations, "We care nothing for your welfare; we want only the immediate gains we can mine from this soil."

I do not have time to talk on the general program, but I do wish to point out that loans this year on wheat put $300,000,000 in the pockets of the farmer that otherwise would have gone to the speculator, that loans on cotton undoubtedly have kept that commodity from staying at 5 cents a pound, and that loans on corn have actually saved the corn farmer. I cannot stand here and say that all the program has been a failure. Had it not been in effect wheat would have sold this year on the basis of Liverpool at 25 cents; so the farmers, the real farmers who are enjoying the benefit, are in favor of the program.

The people who oppose the program are those who are opposed to any farm program and would like to sell the farmer again the old Smoot-Hawley tariff and give him nothing else. I hope for the farmer's sake he will not be taken in by that story again.

The farmers are perfectly willing to pay their way in this program. No farmer has protested the processing tax. The gentleman from Missouri lays on the doorstep of the Committee on Agriculture the responsibility of the farm program, but I may say that on several occasions the Committee on Ways and Means has been approached on the possibility of enacting a processing tax or a certificate plan, call it what you may, to let the present program pay its own way. Personally, I am willing to assume the responsibility and the political disadvantage, if it is such, of introducing a processing-tax bill. I have already done so. I introduced such a tax bill right after the old A. A. A. was declared unconstitutional. I also introduced in this Congress a processing tax on wheat. Most certainly I intend to support a certificate plan or any other plan that will finance and assure the permanency of a farm program.

The farmers are willing to vote such a tax because they realize that if we have to continue to depend on appropriations from the Treasury, the time is coming when the whole program will be lost to the American farmer. Certainly he does not want to have to return to the tender mercies of the high protective tariff under which he suffered such disastrous times previous to the enactment of the present farm program.

There are some little items in this bill that have been cut indiscriminately, without rhyme or reason. I stood on this floor and told the House the results of blowing, of the destruction of the land by wind erosion. Since that time the Soil Conservation Service and the dry-land experiment stations have done a marvelous work in restoring blowing pastures and blowing plowed fields with native grass.

Without any justification, without any sustaining facts to point the way as to how this work would be carried on, the committee cut last year's appropriation for dry-land experiment stations of $226,000 to the nice round figure of $100,000; not because they were shown a way that this great work of grass development and of resodding could be carried on, not because they were shown a way that the production of grain sorghums that can be grown in dry land could be carried on, and not because they were shown a way that the development of trees that will actually grow in the plains area could be carried on, but just because it made a nice round cut of $126,000, that sum was reduced 125 percent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I may say to the gentleman that when the item to which the gentleman refers was discussed in the full committee and I offered an amendment to restore the original amount and asked the chairman of the committee why the bill was cut so unreasonably, the answer was, "We had to cut somewhere." That was the same answer given as a reason for several other drastic cuts.

Mr. FERGUSON. I know my colleague does not agree that these cuts are justified because the gentleman has a dry-land field station in his district. He knows what a great service they render.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that I offered an amendment to restore the sum of $226,000 for dry-land stations that was appropriated last year. The committee without evidence or reason indiscriminately slashed this appropriation from $226,000 to $100,000, which means that considerably more than half of the dry-land stations of the entire country are proposed to be abandoned.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman knows that the dry-land field stations have done more toward the permanent success of agriculture than any other bureau of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly. This so-called economy move is in fact false economy.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. The dry-land field stations, the one at Woodward in particular, can be given credit for the development of grain sorghums, such as maize, which has definitely proved to be the only crop that can be continuously grown with our expected rainfall. This is a contribution to our economy that cannot be equaled by any other single development in the agricultural picture in our country. They have determined proper methods of planting wheat, and now we are making some headway with the use of native grasses in restoring that blown-over land.

I have in my hand a report of the Department of Agriculture made in 1897. Allow me to quote from Grasses and Forage Plants of the Dakotas, by Thomas A. Williams:

It is very important that every possible effort should be made to preserve the native grasses. They are naturally adapted to the conditions which prevail in the region, and it is quite improbable that introduced forms can be had to take their places satisfactorily, at least for years to come. Climatic conditions would soon destroy the ordinary cultivated grasses, but the native species have flourished under it for centuries, and there is no reason they should not continue to do so and still yield plenty of forage if properly handled.

This is one of a series of reports following the unprecedented drought in the nineties. Overgrazing and improper handling had started to deplete the Great Plains in this period. The native grasses were then being considered as the greatest resources the Plains country possessed. In all the period in between the nineties and 3 years ago, when the present grass-breeding project had started, the study of the uses of native grasses was neglected. Although millions of dollars had been spent in the study of breeding of corn, wheat, and other commercial farm products, the possible uses of native grasses had never been expounded until the grass-breeding experiment was started under the direction of the Woodward Dry Land Field Station 3 years ago. I have seen with my own eyes the restoration of a whole farm that had once been plowed to a good stand of various native grasses. In the name of economy the committee would have us abandon this project on which over $100,000 had been expended. In the name of economy the only sensible approach to the restoration of the Great Plains will be abandoned. In the name of economy the future ability of the residents of that area to pay taxes, maintain schools, educate their children, and live with a reasonable degree of security will be greatly hampered, because grass as it was in 1897 is the greatest asset that the Plains country possesses. Certainly an experiment that is making great strides in finding intelligent methods to restore the grass that once made the Great Plains so productive should not be strangled in its infancy. Let us not repeat the mistake an economy-minded Congress made back in 1897. Had the experiments made then not been stopped, the use and value of native grass would have been firmly established and probably the great crime committed out on the Plains in the twenties of plowing up that land, which should have been left in grass, would not have been committed.

I hope when the amendment is offered to restore these dry-land field stations, the Congress will not commit the same crime they committed 43 years ago in the name of economy.

Also, we have an act that has been in effect 3 years with respect to water facilities. It seems to be a kind of orphan child, a product of an area where there are not many Members of Congress to defend it, and it has been left on the doorstep homeless. The Water Facilities Act has instituted 154 projects in 17 of the Western States—small projects with an average cost of $600. If you never lived in the prairie country you cannot realize what one of these small water facilities means to a family. It means that a man is able to live there in time of drought and keep his family alive and off of relief. These water facilities mean life itself to the people in this western plains country. Oftentimes they are constructed as community projects. A little community project on the Cimarron River is now being restored. It has been allowed to get into a bad state of repair because of the fact we had such low agricultural prices in the thirties they could not keep the project up. Now, for a small sum of $50,000, 25 families and well over a thousand acres of land can be restored on an existing project that has been watered successfully in previous years, and had to go out of operation only because of extraordinary weather circumstances and bad prices. This is helping the small farmer to stay on his land that he now owns, and allow him to contribute to the economic life of his community. I hope the Congress will not say that we are going to start these things; that we are going to set up the machinery; that we are going to investigate the possibilities; that we are going to pick out the farms that should be successfully helped with a small water facility—the average price, as I say, has been $600—that we are going to do all the ground work, and then in a wave of economy we are going to wipe it from the picture in order to save $500,000 when, in reality, you lose the investment the Government has made in its investigation of worthy projects. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, a great deal of criticism this afternoon was directed at the chairman who has charge of this bill before the House for not making it available in time for the Members to read it and find out what is in it before it is brought up here for discussion. Personally, I think the criticism is all right, but I want to say that he is not the only one, and the Committee on Appropriations is not the only committee that should be criticized for this very practice. Since I have been a Member of this House, time and again I have seen important bills brought before the membership of this House for consideration and without any Members except the committee members knowing the contents, no copy having been made available.

This is not fair to the membership of the House. We all have our different constituencies to represent, and we have their various interests at heart. Bills are brought in here affecting those interests, and we do not even know the contents of the bill until the debate begins.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MAHON. I think there is something in what the gentleman says, but he should not fail to point out that we usually have several days on an important bill to read the hearings and to read the bill before we vote on it and before it is subject to amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is something to that, but the report on the bill and the bill are not made available, as a rule, until the morning of the day the bill is to be considered. It is a mighty faulty practice for the House of Representatives to indulge in.

I want also to say this to the membership of the House. I believe in economy just as much as any Member of this House, but I do not believe in economy at the expense of progress of the American farmer or at the expense of the youth or of the unemployed of this country. To my mind, the C. C. C. camp is one of the greatest institutions that the present administration has inaugurated for the benefit of the youngsters of this country. It has taken them out of the pool halls and out of the other kinds of hellholes and the alleys and put them into worth-while employment, thereby making good men out of them, yet we find that the appropriation for that activity has been cut in the interest of so-called economy.

We also find that the appropriation for the National Youth Administration has been pared. This, Members of the House, is an institution inaugurated by the Government that is indeed entitled to be commended. It provides a work program for the needy unemployed young people between the ages of 16 and 24 years, inclusive, and assists them to continue their education in schools and colleges, and likewise aids them in the securing of employment. Mind you, it has to do almost exclusively with the needy. Then we find the W. P. A. appropriation cut in the interest of economy. My friends, might it not well be said that it seems to be the poor and the needy who are slashed at by the Director of the Budget and the Appropriations Committee of the House?

My friends, the unemployed of this country, numbering nine or ten million people, have been mighty peaceful for a good many years. Many times they have been hungry. Many times their families have been hungry. I do not think it is economy to refuse to appropriate to provide jobs for the jobless.

I think we should be liberal with a person who cannot find a job, whose job has been taken away from him by the use of mechanics. We know that manpower is being displaced every day by machinery. That is why men and women are thrown upon the streets, unable to find employment. We must not economize at the expense of those human beings, because if we do, you may destroy our very form of government. It is a serious matter.

Another thing that has been cut down is the reclamation in the West. I do not know whether you in the East realize it or not, but a great deal of your market for the manufactured articles and other commodities is in the West, where new land is brought into use, where minerals are mined, where cattle and sheep are raised, where it is necessary to impound these waters as they come out of the mountains and flow into the little streams, then into the great rivers, and on down into the oceans and the Gulf of Mexico, doing nobody any good, but doing harm on their way. We have to harness those waters so that they can be used by our livestock men and our small farmers. Yet in the name of economy we find that that allotment is being cut down in the neighborhood of 40 percent from what it was a year ago.

In the face of a desire for economy we find that the Federal Government advocates the construction of battleships and other weapons to fight some kind of a war that exists only in the minds of war-hysteria people. We find that in the neighborhood of $2,000,000,000 will be asked for that purpose. It will be asked for at the expense of progress, advancement, and improvement of the country, and at the expense of the farmer, the youth, and the unemployed of the country. Personally, my friends, I am not in favor of such a program as that. I favor national defense, but let us not forget that bellies must be provided with beef. I think our good friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]—and I repeat what I said this morning; the farmer has no better friend on this floor than he is—will go along with us and pare down this huge anticipated appropriation for battleships, and so forth, and give it where it is needed.

I want to talk for a moment or two on these parity payments which the committee has cut out of the bill. You will recall when this bill was before the House a year ago the chairman of this subcommittee made one of the finest arguments ever listened to in support of the $225,000,000 to restore parity payments. It was not parity. It was only 75 percent of parity. It remained for the distinguished chairman of our Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to bring forth from the archives of history the words of Alexander Hamilton when the first tariff bill was written in this country, when he said:

If you write a tariff bill to protect the industries of this country, you must vote something to the American farmer to offset the tariff, to put him on a par with the industries of this country.

But he said:

You will not do it in the name of a subsidy or in the name of a gift, but in the name of restitution.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] pointed out that it was returning what belonged to them as Hamilton said. These words are still true. When we voted $225,000,000 a year ago for parity payments that was not a gift to the American farmer. It was not a subsidy to the American farmer. It was trying to place him on 75 percent of par, with the industries from whom he had to buy. We find him selling in an open market. He must take the other fellow's price for everything he sells. When he buys he must buy at the other fellow's price. His head is caught in a nutcracker. He takes the other fellow's price for his products, and he pays the other fellow's price for what he buys.

My friends, the least we can do when the time comes is to up this W. P. A. appropriation to take care of the unemployed in this country. The next thing we must do is to try to restore to the American farmer, as far as we can, parity prices for what he sells with the industries from whom he has to buy.

We hear a lot of talk about parity payments. The phrase "parity payments" is used by a great many without realizing what it is all about. At the last regular session of Congress $225,000,000 were appropriated for the purpose of bringing the farmer's income up to 75 percent of parity. Cotton, corn, wheat, and rice were included in this program.

If the farmer were to receive full parity price for his wheat, such as I am speaking of, he would receive $1.13 per bushel for wheat instead of receiving 75 or 80 cents a bushel, and that in the face of having the appropriation made of $225,000,000 a year ago. Suppose that parity payment is refused under this bill; suppose we do not vote any parity payment, then you may find the American farmer taking 40 or 50 cents a bushel for his wheat.

Let us see what parity payments mean. By "parity payments" we mean such a price for farm products as would equal the price of the commodities which the farmer had to buy during the years from 1910 to 1914. Taking wheat as an example, if we secured the full parity price for wheat, namely, $1.13 per bushel, we could purchase the same amount of commodities that we could have purchased with a bushel of wheat between the years 1910 and 1914. That is what we mean by parity. We take the price of the commodity between the years 1910 and 1914 and figure it from that basis. In other words, farm products have not kept pace with the rising price of all other commodities since the years 1910 to 1914. The American farmer's dollar today, bolstered up as it was by the $225,000,000 parity payments, is still only a 75-cent dollar.

The time is coming when Congress will quit voting these parity payments. There is no question about that—if it has not already come to us now. We have not thus far produced a plan whereby the farmer is going to be protected against the monopolies from which he is required to purchase his goods.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. The Committee on Agriculture spent days last winter on the cost-of-production plan.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. When it came to a final vote, seven voted to bring it out. Here we have the certificate plan before us, but as yet no hearings.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes. As the gentleman has pointed out, we have too many Members of Congress giving merely lip service to the American farmer. That is the kind of service farmers are getting. The cost-of-production bill should have been reported to this House. A parity-payment bill should have been reported to this House giving the American farmer the same chance the monopolies of this country enjoy and give us a chance to give the farmer a square deal.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Perhaps we will have to remove the strong power of the arm of the banker group along the Atlantic border.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is no doubt about that, but at the same time it is not entirely the bankers' fault. Monopolies have grown up in this country. I had to do with the prosecution of monopolies as special counsel to the Federal Trade Commission during the war, and I know what I am talking about. The price of everything that the American farmer has to buy is fixed, and at a profit, and the farmer has got to pay that price and profit or go home without it, but when he takes his stuff to the market he has got to take the other fellow's price for it.

I am reminded of the testimony of a harness manufacturer I had on the stand in a case. I asked him: "If this policy continues of the farmer paying profits on everything he buys but taking the other fellow's price on everything he sells regardless of his losses, how long can it continue?" What do you suppose his answer was? His answer was: "Eventually he will join the Indian class." I asked: "By that you mean just what?" He replied: "He will become the vanishing American."

That is what will happen. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, imports from South America are not only taking the American market away from the American farmer but they are bringing in that dread destroyer of mankind—typhus fever. Tennessee, Alabama, and Georgia have had hundreds of cases of typhus fever which is spread by rats and fleas which come in with the shipments of grain from countries infected. It can, therefore, be asserted with certainty that not only are the trade agreements, which encourage and stimulate these shipments that are destroying the American farmer, but that disease and death ride in these trade pacts.

My authority for the foregoing statement is an editorial contained in the November 1939 number of the Journal of the Tennessee State Medical Association, published at Nashville, Tenn.—Secretary Hull's home State. Under the caption "Did someone fall down on the job?" the editor of this magazine states that typhus fever is occurring in several Southern States with sufficient frequency to create very definite concern. This authoritative magazine states that this situation calls for action and inquiry as to how this dread plague of the middle ages has come back to America. The editorial goes on to state—

The following figures supplied from reliable sources give some idea of the increasing frequency of the disease in the last 4 years. In Tennessee there were 8 cases in 1935, 6 cases in 1936, 21 cases in 1937, and 24 cases in 1938.

For 1939, the figures for the State, as a whole, are not available, but the city of Nashville, alone, has had 44 cases to October 31.

The State of Alabama had 294 cases in 1935, 369 cases in 1936, 478 cases in 1937, and 342 cases in 1938.

The State of Georgia had 485 cases in 1935, 814 cases in 1936, 1,012 cases in 1937, and 908 cases in 1938.

A much smaller number of cases of the disease occurred in Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina. In all of these States there was a marked increase in the number of cases in the years since 1935, as compared with the years prior to 1935. Figures for this group up to date are not available.

It suffices to say that there has been a marked increase in the incidence of this preventable disease since 1935.

In Nashville, a majority of the cases have occurred in and adjacent to mills which handle corn. It is further brought out that corn has been imported from Argentina and shipped to these mills in the last few years.

It is common knowledge that rats are prone to accompany these shipments of grain. If they happen to be infected rats, they, of course, spread the disease in the rat population, and the fleas in turn spread the disease to humans.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. CULKIN. In a few moments I will yield, if the gentleman does not mind.

The learned editor of this publication makes the point that this alarming situation has gone by default on the part of the Public Health Service. By inference he leads us to believe that the Public Health Service instead of being on the job in a situation like this is devoting its time and its energies to the advancement and circulation of propaganda for socialized medicine. I do not attempt to pass upon the propriety or correctness of this charge. If the charge is true, it is but a contributing factor. If it is mistaken, I think I can definitely trace the reason for this failure to quarantine our people properly against the plagues and diseases incident to other countries and which we have practically wiped out here by our sanitary leadership and the expenditures of large sums of money.

In the foregoing article the cause of the Nashville, Tenn., outbreak of typhus is apparent. I quote again from the editorial in the Medical Journal:

In Nashville a majority of the cases have occurred in and adjacent to mills which handle corn. It is further brought out that corn has been imported from Argentina and shipped to these mills in the last few years.

The State Department, in charge of trade agreements, has not been concerned about the health and well-being of the American people, but only in a puerile attempt to purchase peace throughout the world by giving foreign countries the American market for farm products, including corn. The Public Health Service is at fault because they stood passively by and permitted to be written into all trade agreements a provision tying the hands of the United States on sanitary laws and regulations. In the cause of international peace, which seems to be a will-o'-the-wisp these troublesome days, Secretary Hull's reciprocal trade treaty writers have tendered to foreign nations joint power over sanitary regulations. This clause appears in all of the trade agreements.

History will tell you that the Argentine trade agreement was not consummated for the reason that there was a storm coming out of the west to which the treaty makers by reason of the approaching Presidential election bowed their heads. But the same attitude of indifference to sanitary regulations applies not only to the countries to which treaties have been made but to all other countries; this under the multilateral application of each treaty.

Dr. Parran, of the Health Department, should get on his seven-league boots and get down South as promptly as possible and investigate this situation. He is chargeable with the public health and should call a spade a spade, despite the bullying attitude of the State Department, which ignores the rights of the American farmer and the health of the American people.

I want to say to the internationalists in the State Department, including Secretary Hull, that a far-flung epidemic of typhus in the South or in the North will not make for international good will but only for suffering and death among the American people.

I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman places responsibility for typhus in the South on the Secretary of State, due to the fact that rats—

Mr. CULKIN. Please do not make a speech, but ask a relevant question.

Mr. FERGUSON. To my knowledge there has been no reduction in any tariff on the importation of grain in any reciprocal-trade treaty.

Mr. CULKIN. But I can show the gentleman where the State Department through its Foreign Service has been stimulating shipments at every period during the life of these agreements. If the gentleman would take the time to read any of these trade agreements he would find out what I am shooting at here.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. I am trying to bring to the gentleman's attention—and if he will look in the agreement he will see this is true—that the State Department has tied the hands of the American Congress and has made it impossible, if you please, for America to write sanitary laws in order to protect the health of our own people. I claim that Dr. Parran is properly chargeable with being influenced by the State Department in not opposing such legislation. I say further to the gentleman that it is apparently the opinion of an authoritative medical publication in Secretary Hull's own State that Dr. Parran is not functioning. The gentleman knows that in every one of these trade agreements there is written in the agreement a provision that no sanitary regulation can be imposed without the consent of the other party. They have joint control over our health regulations.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I may say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] that, contrary to his statement, in every trade agreement that has been made it is specifically written that no sanitary regulations of this country can be affected or can be considered affected by the trade agreement.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman has not read the agreements.

Mr. FERGUSON. I have read the regulation that was inserted in the treaty with Canada, which kept every one of our sanitary regulations in effect.

Mr. CULKIN. The distinguished gentleman is hopelessly mistaken.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will quote the RECORD. If the gentleman will refer to the letter from the Secretary of State, quoted in the speech I made on reciprocal-trade treaties, he will see that those sanitary regulations are not only quoted but set out in full.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman got hold of some propaganda from the State Department.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the Biggers unemployment census shows approximately 34,000 boot and shoe workers totally unemployed and 15,000 boot and shoe workers partially unemployed, and the fact that the Canadian plant of the Bata Co. is operating with 225 Czechs and only a few Canadians, it seems to me it is very important for us to look over the activities of the Bata Co. insofar as it concerns the welfare of the people of the United States.

I have here a number of pamphlets from the Department of Commerce which show very clearly that Mr. Bata has disrupted the boot and shoe industry in every country in which he has opened plants. I also have some pamphlets showing pictures of the workers, and they are obviously quite young children, demonstrating what that concern would do to our labor market and to our older workers.

I also have a pair of shoes in my hand advertised as made in the Belcamp, Md., shop, which retail at $1.99. I have the advertisement of those shoes and the bill of sale. If you will look at the shoes, you will find they are out of line so far as the heel and toe are concerned. They are simple and of inferior quality, but a temptation for people to buy.

A little over 25 years ago several shoemakers came to this country to study American shoemaking methods. They worked for various periods of time in various shoe districts throughout the United States. Since returning to Europe they have repeatedly claimed that they have copied and followed American shoemaking methods. Today we have the strange experience of having these same workers return to the United States to teach American shoe workers shoemaking methods and techniques.

Of course, to anyone familiar with the shoemaking industry it is apparent that I am speaking of the Bata Shoe Co., of Zlin, Czechoslovakia. The name Bata Shoe Co. has become increasingly familiar to the American shoe industry and those connected with it. And now, because they have come into our midst, I think it would be highly desirable to cut through the fog and confusion that has been created regarding their activities and see what the true facts are regarding this company's development in the United States.

I may say I have checked very carefully the facts I am about to present to you today, so I am sure of the truth of what I am saying.

The Bata Shoe Co. first began extensive activities in the United States in the late twenties when it began the importation of the McKay type shoe in large quantities. This importation was the beginning of a well-planned development of this company's activities here. Soon thereafter the company established the Bata Shoe Co., Inc., in New York and began the establishment of a retail chain of stores in the Midwest, centering around Chicago, Ill.

These stores were in competition with American shoe shops which sold a line and grade of shoe acceptable to the American consumer. In order to satisfy the same demand, it was necessary for them to purchase shoes from the American manufacturers in the domestic market. This was due to the fact that the Bata Co. was forced to pay a 20-percent tariff on all shoes imported into the United States. Twenty percent of a $1 retail pair of shoes was only 20 cents and could be absorbed by the low wage and labor cost which they paid in their foreign factories. It was not as easy for them to absorb 20 percent of their $5 shoes which amounted to as much as $1. Therefore, they purchased the more expensive shoes for their domestic market and imported their cheaper shoes from their foreign factories.

But the domestic manufacturer from whom they purchased their medium-priced and expensive shoes was constantly hard put to it to obtain their orders because subtle propaganda was constantly being spread that "Bata is about to establish a factory in the United States." And it was no coincidence that these recurrent rumors appeared most strongly just prior to the time that the style shows were to be held, at which contracts were to be signed for shoes for the coming season.

Thus for many years in the past decade the American shoe industry and the American shoeworkers have seen the growth and development of Bata's retail chain of stores and at the same time have heard recurring, persistent rumors that Bata and all the dire things he represented to them is about to be brought to the United States.

The rumors served their purpose. The manufacturers, in order to gain an immediate order, would repeatedly cut their cost at labor's expense and justify themselves with the claim and thought that "if we don't accept this order at a reduced rate, Bata will establish his factory here and provide a more serious and more threatening competition than he does now."

The workers in the shoe industry were told each period after style season that they must once again accept a cut in wages if they are to prevent Bata establishing here and throwing the whole shoe industry into chaos.

It was because of these contacts with the Bata Shoe Co. and knowledge of their methods, that the shoe industry opposed so violently the special concessions given to this company in the reciprocal-trade treaty between Czechoslovakia and the United States. At the hearings held in connection with this treaty it was brought out especially by the trade-union representatives, that while they had every sympathy with the democratic government of Czechoslovakia, they opposed these concessions for the shoe industry, because the Bata Shoe Co., representing the only major shoe manufacturer engaged in export to the United States would be the sole beneficiary of this section of the treaty. Anyone who has checked up on the methods and labor standards of this company, as I shall develop at greater length shortly, would agree that this company and its methods was not in sympathy with the true democracy and the progressive methods of government of their country. It was for that reason and for that reason alone that we, who are familiar with the shoe industry and its problems, so strongly opposed the shoe section of that reciprocal-trade treaty. We cannot help feeling, to this day, that our cause was prejudged and that our explanation and facts were given little consideration when the negotiations were concluded.

The treaty would have permitted the importation into this country of some 6,000,000 pairs of shoes, or up to one-quarter percent of the total production of shoes in this country. However, as the opposition pointed out at the time, these shoes, consisting almost solely of cemented women's novelty shoes, constituted a much larger percentage of that class of shoe production, and due to the low price factor became an important pace setter in that branch of the shoe industry.

Unfortunately, both for the Bata Shoe Co. and our own State Department, as well as for a number of other groups and the peace of the world, Hitler had other plans. In the fall of 1938 Hitler took over the Sudeten lands, and on March 15, 1938 occupied Bohemia and Moravia, thus absorbing both the home plant of the Bata Shoe Co. in Zlin and the basic establishments of the industrial empire of the Bata Co. which were located in the absorbed territories. The direct effect of all this on the Bata Shoe Co.'s plans in the United States was that imports from the home plant in Zlin had to be marked "Made in Germany." All the confusion and representations of the Bata Shoe Co. that they no longer had control of the company's properties in the protectorate of Czechoslovakia have since proven false, but at that time and until the late fall of 1939 efforts were made here in Washington, in Czechoslovakia, and Berlin, Germany, to evade the 25-percent countervailing duties imposed upon imports of German products by the President on March 18, 1939.

This action by the President cut off imports from Zlin and hampered the plans of the Bata Shoe Co. for their development of a much larger chain of retail shoe stores than they already had established here. At first they attempted to provide the deficiency by increasing their imports from their factories in neutral countries, such as the Netherlands, but found difficulty in overcoming the tremendous problems created by shipping difficulties due to naval warfare and the sinking of allied and neutral shipping.

These problems gave incentive to the speeding up of the developed plans for the establishment of a factory in the United States, and by April 7, 1939, in the Hartford Democrat and Aberdeen Enterprise, published in Aberdeen, Md., you will find the following paragraph:

It is understood that recent developments in that country since its invasion by Germany have brought to a head plans for the construction of a similar plant in America.

On April 28 the same paper carried the definite announcement that the Bata plant was to be constructed at Belcamp, Md.

Actually the Bata Co. had planned to establish its American factory at Belcamp as early as the summer of 1934 and late that September made arrangements that the new Philadelphia Road pass through its property. They later paid the Maryland State Highway Commission $11,000 for this arrangement. Meanwhile they had arranged for special consideration from local officials and followed this up with a petition to the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Labor requesting the Department to permit the Bata Co. to import 100 citizens of Czechoslovakia to "employ these persons as instructors in the making of shoes in accordance with the particular methods and in the operation of the special type of shoe machinery which will be used by the petitioner in its new factory." The petition was based on the allegation that the machines used by the Bata Shoe Co. were different from machines used in a comparable American factory. Likewise, the petition claimed that 5 or more years' experience in the Bata factory in Zlin was necessary to develop the skills required to teach their "peculiar" methods.

Mr. Chairman, may I say that the machines seem to be exactly like the machines in use here and that may be secured in this country. May I also state that the work can be done by our own already well-trained boot and shoe workers. May I state further that the Department of Labor in making an investigation of the Bata plant at Belcamp, Md., found that only a small number of the Czechoslovakian instructors were needed to in any way carry on the work. I have here a table showing the ages of the so-called instructors on behalf of whom request was made for permission to enter this country. One was 16, two were 17, two were 18, four were 19, and nine were 20, and so on. These were all brought into the country as instructors.

It is possible that the Department of Labor had no way of making an immediate check upon these claims, though I am informed that within the Department were three experts who were familiar with Bata methods, at least two of whom had visited the Bata plant at Zlin. Also, the Department of Labor could have made use of the knowledge of experts in the Department of Commerce, the Tariff Commission, and the Treasury Department, who had familiarized themselves with the methods and business techniques of the Bata Shoe Co.

However, the Immigration Service did not consult these experts nor make any effort to determine the truth of the Bata Co.'s claims beyond the holding of a formal, perfunctory hearing in their New York office May 11, 1939, 1 week to the day after the petition was filed, and without any notice to the industry or the trade-unions who might have appeared and presented the full facts sought by the examining officer before the permit was granted. However, the Department saw fit to grant this permit after a hearing at which the only party represented was the Bata Co. through three officials of their American subsidiary. This hearing definitely established the fact that the Bata Co. had planned to establish a factory at Belcamp and that it took the "minimum of 5 years' experience at the Bata plant in Zlin before anyone could expect to serve the purpose that we wish to put these people to that are coming over."

Another important fact developed at this hearing was the answer to the question:

Q. In the event it should be required, would your company be prepared to post bond to guarantee the departure of these persons from the United States?

A. While we respectfully request that no bond be asked because of the amount involved and because of the fact that we are taking the responsibility for these people and are willing to guarantee their leaving on a certain date, I can say that if that was the only condition on which they would be admitted, then, of course, we would post the bond.

Though the officials of the Labor Department were aware of the bad faith shown by officials of the Bata Shoe Co., the Department granted the permit in a letter dated June 9, 1939. The conditions of this permit required the Bata Co. to furnish the Immigration and Naturalization Service with "the name of the alien, name of the vessel, the date and port of contemplated arrival, prior to each alien's applying at the American consulate at Prague for a visa and before departure from Czechoslovakia."

These conditions were immediately violated when, on July 6, 1939, some 23 employees of the Bata Co. arrived at Ellis Island without having fulfilled the above requirements of the permit and attempted to cover their entry into the United States by claiming that they were "visitors to the world's fair." Each of the 23 admitted upon questioning that they were employees of the Bata Co.; that they were awaiting orders from Mr. Bata; and that they had such small sums as $40 as their total cash assets. I am amazed at the effort of this company to legalize later the entry of these aliens by attempting to negotiate with the Immigration Service for the permanent entry of "25 chemists, inventors, engineers, executives, and experts in the manufacture of products by the Company Bata." The Department sidestepped this request by pointing out that the immigration laws required "the procurement of a consular immigration visa from the Department of State." As late as November 13, 1939, 7 of these 23 were still in the United States, although they had been granted visitor's visas for a 60-day period only, beginning on July 6, 1939. Two of the 7 applied for extensions, leaving 5 in outright violation of their visas as visitors, and with no effort made to obtain legal extension or entry. Is it possible that the Bata Co. feels that it is above complying with American law?

The Bata Co. further violated the conditions of the permit of entry of June 9, 1939, by claiming that the permit granted for 100 did not include as separate individuals the wives and adult children of the so-called instructors, who were permitted entry by the Department of Labor.

After extensive lengthy negotiations between the Department of Labor and counsel for the Bata Co., the company was permitted to bring wives and children into the country on visitors' visas.

At this point I would like to make clear the fact that we no longer are involved with only 72 individuals, as the company's inspired publicity claims, but we have 7 world's fair visitors, 44 visitors accompanying 72 so-called instructors, plus 26 executives and officials here as visitors "on business," plus their families, servants, secretaries, chauffeurs, and so forth, a total of more than 200 here in connection with the Belcamp factory alone. The number of alien officials, executives, and workers here in connection with the retail stores in the Midwest, the new chain of retail stores in the East, and those in each of our possessions, including the Panama Canal Zone, the Virgin Islands, and so forth—the total number of individuals involved, I feel sure, would easily come to 500 or more.

Last autumn an attempt was made by Mr. Bata to bring 500 workers from Czechoslovakia in addition to the first request for the 100 so-called instructors. In conjunction with others, I worked very hard to prevent these alien workers from coming into the country and apparently we were successful in our efforts.

To me the most amazing fact regarding these aliens, in view of the company's claims of skill, is their youth. I refer you to the above table showing the age distribution of the so-called Czech instructors imported by the company. One expert admitted, Ludmila Rokytova, though listed as an official of the firm, was only 16 years of age. Others ranged through the adolescent years. One-fourth of the total were 20 years or younger. One-half of the grand total were 25 years or less. Look it over.

At what age were these experts employed by the Bata Co. to give them 5 or more years' experience, which according to the company's own petition for admission of these instructors, was necessary to develop the skills required to teach the Bata methods. Is it possible that this company employs such large numbers of youth in their plant at Zlin?

I have here in my hand a booklet published in three languages, including English, by the Bata Co. for distribution to visitors and those interested in the Bata system. On page 29 is a picture of a child learning to use the Singer sewing machine. This child certainly cannot be more than 8 years of age. It is plain from the picture and the caption below it that this child is learning skills involving the use of this machine. I now take up another booklet published by the same company entitled "Zlin, the Place of Activity," and find from pictures on pages 41, 43, and 47 that the use of the Singer sewing machine constitutes a vital part of the production system of the Bata Shoe Co.

It is beginning to seem to me that the claims of trade-union officials, in the hearings before the Tariff Commission, that their opposition to the concessions to the Bata Co. were based on low wages and the exploitation of youth were well founded in fact.

In the petition for the importation of the instructors the Bata Co. stated that their—Experience * * * convinces the petitioner that the best results can be obtained by employing young men and women locally, paying them a comparatively high rate of wages. * * *

And then gives the real reason for their importation by continuing—

Petitioner believes this plan will accomplish better results than can be had by endeavoring to recruit its force from among experienced shoemakers who are not acquainted with the Bata methods.

The company proceeded to follow its plan along this line and early last summer—

Every member of the 1939 graduating class of Harford County high schools received a card inviting applications for employment. Soon thereafter, the invitation was extended to 1938 and 1937 graduates.

Thus the company kept the implied promises of Mr. Bata, who when dedicating the laying of the cornerstone said, "I intend to employ no one except high-school graduates and to educate them in my methods"—copied for the most part from American mass-production methods.

Mr. Bata, thus absorbs a small section of American youth, but he completely throws on the industrial scrap heap all American shoe workers now unemployed and those who will thus be displaced by the so-called economies of his system.

His statement, just quoted, claims that his system is an adaptation of American mass-production methods, so we should look at those methods to see what they produce.

In the newspaper article already referred to in the Sunday Star of November 19, 1939, there is the following quotation regarding Mr. Bata's methods:

These methods are an adaptation of the conveyor-belt system perfected in the automobile industry. Rawhides and other materials begin at the top of the building and flow endlessly down and around from floor to floor, past the benches of workers, who have each one a small task to do in the making of the finished shoe. One man polishes the leather of the hide. Another cuts the uppers; another cuts the caps; another inserts eyelets; another turns the welt; another sandpapers heels.

"And it is fast," declared an 18-year-old girl, a graduate of Havre de Grace High School last year.

"They assigned me to brushing polish around the edge of the sole and they gave me a whistle.

RESULTS FROM A WHISTLE

"If you can't keep up with the shoes going past on the belt," they said, "blow the whistle. The belt will stop till you catch up." I managed to keep up with the belt all morning, but in the middle of the afternoon I fell behind. So I blew the whistle. All of a sudden it seemed as if about 20 instructors were around me, shouting instructions in Czech and German and English.

"I vowed right then that I would never blow that whistle again—not even if the factory blew up."

It is obvious from this article that the Bata system has adopted the technique of the American mass-production system without the social viewpoint and humane methods of the American use of that system.

This same article points out that these youngsters were employed at the minimum wage required by law. The Bata Co.'s petition for the admission of these so-called instructors alleged that the best results could be obtained by employing young people and paying them a comparatively high rate of wages. Does Mr. Bata think that the minimum established by law is a high rate of wages?

The report of a memorandum by the Immigration Department officials in regard to the second investigation of the Bata Shoe Co., conducted late in November 1939, contains the following:

Although the petition mentioned above also alleged that the best results could be obtained by employing young men and women locally and paying them a comparatively high rate of wages, it should be stated that the greater part of these new workers are being paid the minimum wage prescribed by the Wage and Hour Division of this Department—30 cents an hour, or $12.60 per week, with a social-security deduction of 13 cents.

In addition, this alien concern is not complying with the minimum-wage standards established by this Congress. In a civil action brought before the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, the Wage and Hour Division charged the Bata Shoe Co. not only with failing to pay the minimum required by law, and failing to pay overtime for hours worked beyond the maximum set for the regular rate by law, but this company likewise, which seeks special favors in our midst, was charged with and later admitted, by a stipulation dated December 19, 1939, the full essence of the complaint. For the short period of 1 year under which we have been operating under the act, this company, to bring itself under compliance with the act, made restitution of $7,000 in wages to 65 of its employees in Chicago.

I am reliably informed that the company is also violating the provisions of the wage-hour law in its plant in Maryland. Trade unions, representing a number of employees in that plant, have filed complaints with the Wage and Hour Division recently. They were informed that an investigation would be instituted by the Wage and Hour Division. If and when further violations were found in this plant, it seems to me that this visitor in our midst is certainly abusing the hospitality which has been shown him. It is time the administrative agencies of Government required strict adherence to the spirit and letter of their regulations before conceding further favorable administrative decisions to the Bata Co.

The experts and officials of the Department of Labor who have made a thorough study of the methods of this company, of their machinery, of their technique and business methods, have required the company to reduce its alien staff of instructors to a maximum of 10. This ruling was made after a full, fair consideration of all the facts, and all the allegations of the company in its original petition. Now, instead of complying with the regulations of the Department, powerful interests in the State of Maryland, apparently at the request of the Bata Co., are bringing pressure upon the Department of Labor to change its ruling.

In behalf of the American shoe industry, I urge the Department of Labor to stand by its determination in this matter, and I urge the Members of this House to investigate the facts regarding the Bata Co. before they associate themselves in the efforts in its behalf.

You should know the tremendous harm which the methods of this company will work on our already trained boot and shoe people, when the Biggers unemployment census shows that 34,000 boot and shoe workers were totally unemployed.

and 15,000 were partially unemployed. It also works a tremendous hardship on all labor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentlewoman is complaining about the admission of certain people who come here to engage in that industry?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes. If I had had more time, I could have pointed out that many of these persons really were not entitled to permits. I understand that all but a few of them are to be deported on the 1st of February.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Exactly; because they came here under a temporary permit as experts to train Americans in that particular industry.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And they were not experts and were not needed.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is a different matter.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They did not live up to the terms of their agreement, as I have already pointed out. They asked also, I hear, for a permit to stay permanently.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They could not do that under the law if they came here for the sole purpose of teaching American girls and boys that particular trade or vocation.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. If you follow my remarks closely, you will see they tried to evade the law. I may say to the gentleman—

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Then they will be sent back in due course.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They are to be deported very shortly, I understand. You see what a hardship it places on our workers to import foreign labor. We have the best and most highly trained shoe workers in the world. It seems to me one of our most vital needs today is to put our people back to work, and we cannot sanction any such activity as the Bata method in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, it may perhaps seem strange to you that a Member from the prairies of Nebraska is replying to the gentlewoman from the industrial State of Massachusetts on this question of aliens who are in the United States presumably to teach Americans a new method of manufacturing shoes. I was very much interested in the statement of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts and the statement by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] that these people will be deported.

Because of my interest in the welfare of the Czech people I have interested myself in this particular case. I believe every Member of this House should know something about it.

I know the gentlewoman from Massachusetts is very much interested, as I am, in securing jobs for the unemployed people of our country. She comes from a district that is purely industrial. I imagine that in Lynn and in Boston, and in that part of the country, they make more shoes than in any other place in the United States. Naturally she is interested in idle shoemakers. I am interested in idle farmers.

I am opposed to aliens coming into this country at any time and taking the jobs of any unemployed Americans. I believe our most serious question is to see that we do something about this unemployment problem, which is the most serious problem confronting the Nation today. I think we should give more attention to that problem than we are giving at this time. We debate here today an agricultural bill. The reductions in this agricultural bill means a desertion of the farmyard in favor of the navy yard.

May I say to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts that she has 36,000 unemployed shoemakers, but I have 40,000 unemployed people in my State. All of them depend upon our farmers for a living. Our farmers are not well off. Let us see how much New England has helped my farmers by buying American leather.

With the permission of the Chair, I place in the RECORD just how many hides have come in from foreign countries and used in the making of shoes by the shoe monopoly, hides which come in direct competition with hides from the States like Nebraska:

Here are 72 poor Czechs, who are administrators and instructors, who are instructing Americans how to make shoes in a new method and actually giving jobs to a thousand Americans who have not had jobs before, and creating a million-dollar-a-year pay roll. They tell me they will use American labor only and eventually create a large market for Nebraska hides and southern cotton. The chairman of the Immigration Committee assures you on this floor of this House that these handful of Czechs are going to be deported because, as he claims, they have infringed some immigration laws. I want to tell the chairman of the Immigration Committee that I took this matter up with the Department of Labor and the Immigration and Naturalization officials. I think I know what these officials are up against. I have taken it up with the State Department; I have taken it up with Mr. Goodman, of the C. I. O.; I have taken it up with the delegation from Massachusetts, and it is strange that a Member from Nebraska and a Member from New York and Massachusetts must discuss a question which is not in their particular districts but in the district of the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE], who so ably presides over that committee and who is right here now and knows more about this question than any of us here on the floor of the House.

Mr. COLE of Maryland rose.

Mr. STEFAN. In just a minute I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] if I may proceed now.

I want to repeat that I am opposed to any alien coming to this country and taking a job which rightfully belongs to an unemployed American, because we have 9,000,000 unemployed here. I have served in this House long enough with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] to know that he has been fighting to help the unemployed, and if he can get a factory in his district which will take a thousand or 3,500 unemployed off the unemployed rolls and give them a job, I am for him.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. STEFAN. I certainly will yield to my friend from Maryland.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. As I understand the situation, as far back as last June the Bata Co. made a request of our Government that 100 employees, the type of which could not be found in this country, be permitted to come here for a period of 1 year. After investigation, and I assume a thorough investigation, 72 were admitted, but an order permitting 100, I think, was passed. Like the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska now in the Well of the House, I hold no brief for alien competition with our local unemployed or employed labor, but I do want to testify to the dignity and the magnitude which the development of this plant in Maryland presents at this time. It would astonish any Member of this House to see the tremendous strides they have made. It will be one of the largest plants in the East before a great while. Some have not been able to understand why, after investigation, they were permitted to enter the United States and then, after 4 or 5 months of their term, during which, as I have been advised, they have been schooling our local people in the particular technique required in the shoe industry—and all expecting to go back within a year and have no intention of staying here—why, all of a sudden, we find an order directing them to pull up stakes and go back when so much has been done upon the basis that the order issued last June meant what it said. This plant is giving welcome work to many of my constituents, but like all who have spoken, none want imported labor, except when in compliance with the language of the pending order, to compete with them.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I will gladly if the gentlewoman from Massachusetts can clear that up.

Mr. STEFAN. I want to thank the gentleman in whose district this factory is located. It is my belief that the international headquarters of many industries are going to be moved to the United States of America because of the persecution of dictators in foreign lands.

After a careful and personal investigation of the visa headquarters of our Foreign Service, it is my belief that everybody in all parts of the world wants to come to the United States of America to live, and I sympathize with them. What a privilege it is.

I am opposed to the action of the Commissioner of Immigration in revoking the permit issued by the Department of Labor on June 9, 1939, to permit the entry into the United States of 100 Czech nationals for supervisory employment at the Bata Shoe Co. plant at Belcamp, Md., for a period not to exceed 1 year.

This order, which is alleged to have been issued without the Bata Shoe Co. even knowing that the approval of the permit was even being considered, is, in my opinion, unjust, discriminatory, and prejudiced against a group of Czech people who are making it possible for nearly a thousand American workers to have a job in favor of thousands of alien refugees who are in this country with the permission of the same Department which is extending the stay of these aliens, who, instead of making jobs for American unemployed people, are taking some of those jobs away from them.

If the Department insists on carrying out this revocation, I fear it will result in the closing of a new enterprise which has brought into our country several millions of dollars of new capital and brought to us a new pay roll which eventually may run into many millions of dollars annually.

I plead with the Department of Labor to revoke their latest order and again reconsider the matter and allow these Czech nationals to remain in this country for the 1 year as originally promised them in order that the program to instruct Americans in the Bata method of shoe construction can be carried out as originally planned. I ask that this order be rescinded and that some of these Czech nationals be allowed to come to Nebraska and act as instructors for Nebraska unemployed people who would be employed in a branch factory if Dr. Jan Bata expands his American enterprise and opens a branch shoe factory in Nebraska. With an army of eight to ten million of our own people unemployed, I feel that every encouragement should be given to any new enterprise which will give men and women employment. Because of the drought which has existed in my district for several years, hundreds of people are unemployed there and are living from the funds appropriated by Congress annually for relief purposes. Most of these people want a legitimate job. They want to work and improve their condition and the condition of their family. They want an opportunity to eventually own their own homes, provide a living for their families, and have some assurance that there will be some future for their children. The establishment of a factory in my district similar to the one Dr. Bata constructed at Belcamp, Md., where they are now employing 800 people, would be a godsend to the people of my district. I therefore plead with the Department of Labor and those responsible for the issuance of the new order which threatens to close the new factory to give every consideration to my plea and give me as much assistance as possible to secure jobs for unemployed American men and women.

I am told that there are more than 12,000 alien refugees in our country who have overstayed their time, and that the Department of Labor is extending the time for these aliens. It is my belief that many of these aliens are taking the jobs which belong to Americans. I am sincerely of the belief that these thousands upon thousands of alien refugees will remain in the United States permanently. I am also sincere in the belief that these 12,000 aliens are merely the vanguard of additional thousands of aliens who are coming to this country at this time and will come in the future.

It was my privilege during August of 1939 to make an official investigation for the House Committee on Appropriations of our foreign missions. I visited the missions in Norway, France, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Hungary, and Yugoslavia. I especially made a carefully conducted observation of the work of the visa divisions in the various missions. I talked to the employees in these divisions and also to the representatives of the Department of Labor, whom I found to be very active and efficiently conducting their duties. However, I was amazed at the tremendous task confronted by these visa divisions. I found thousands of people waiting to register to come to the United States. I found the registration books blocked for some years to come by people who are anxious to come to this country to live. I talked with hundreds of other people who are anxious to pay their fees for the purpose of merely registering, in spite of the fact that the books were blocked and their chances of coming to this country—especially not for many years to come. Yet they were anxious to have that slip of paper in order to show that they had registered to come to the United States of America. In fact, nearly everyone I talked to in every country I visited wanted to come to the United States to live. I found many people who would surrender a fortune to secure that privilege or to secure some preferential status on our quota list—which, of course, is not possible.

The reason I am pleading for these Czech people to be allowed to remain in this country is because they are not taking the job of one single American. In fact, they are teaching Americans a new method of shoemaking in order that Americans can have jobs. In fact, already they have made it possible for nearly 1,000 Americans to have a job. This is somewhat different from the effect the 12,000 to 20,000 alien refugees will have on our army of unemployed Americans. In my opinion these alien refugees will remain in this country permanently and take the jobs of just so many Americans who are now employed. This army of aliens will be added to because of the tremendous financial program backed strongly by people financially qualified to carry out the program. I am not opposed to aiding alien refugees, but I am tremendously disturbed at anything that may be done which would take away from our employed people their jobs and throw them into the army of unemployed. If it was right to let them come here in the first place, why the sudden change of attitude by the Labor Department now?

I am informed that the Bata Shoe Co. was organized in this country in 1928. From that date until about June 1939 its sole business was the sale of shoes in the United States, having operated about 50 retail stores. About 75 percent of those shoes which it sold were purchased in the United States, and the other 25 percent were imported from Czechoslovakia. In 1939, because of financial and political conditions abroad, the Bata industries in Europe decided to transfer as far as possible its manufacturing operations to the United States.

It was thought that the manufacture by an American company of an American product, which, because of the more efficient methods of manufacturing used by the Bata people, be sold at a reasonable price would capture much of the foreign market for shoes, particularly the market which existed in South and Central America which already was a good field for the Bata products and which, because of conditions in Europe, was being lost. Dr. Jan Bata, who came to see me personally because he is interested in expanding his business and the possibility of opening a factory in my State of Nebraska if expansion permits, stated that the importance of the export phase of this business may be seen from the fact that heretofore the Bata factories in Czechoslovakia alone have supplied foreign markets with approximately 20,000,000 pairs of shoes annually. It was contemplated that the transfer of manufacture to the United States would result in the employment of not less than 5,000 Americans in not less than 2 or 3 years. This would mean an annual pay roll in excess of $5,000,000 to employees. In addition, it would mean a great increase in employment in allied industries. It was estimated that the cost of raw materials for this factory would equal a sum like the annual pay roll. Above all, it was not contemplated that any manufacturing plant established in the United States would employ foreign labor; rather it was planned that all operations be carried on by American labor. I was told that it would be necessary at the outset to have skilled employees of the Bata Co. in Europe to train skilled employees in the United States in the methods of Bata manufacture. The reason for that is the Bata system is different than the system used by any other shoe company. The Bata organization has developed a round conveyor system which is adaptable to the manufacture of numerous sizes and types of shoes, and was developed in various places in the world after the expenditure of several million dollars. Because it was contemplated that the shoes to be manufactured in this country would be sold throughout the various countries of the world it would be necessary to train prospective American employees not only in the technical processes of manufacture but in the variations in shoes used in different places in the world and in the Bata system of world distribution and merchandising of world products.

I quote here part of a brief regarding the application of the Bata Shoe Co. for temporary permits for the 100 Czech nationals to act as instructors at its shoe plant at Belcamp, Md.:

With the aforesaid considerations in mind the Bata organization decided that if the United States Government would grant the necessary visas and working permits for 100 of its skilled Czech employees to act as instructors in training American employees for a period of 1 year (so that the Bata system could be properly instituted) that it would construct a large manufacturing plant at Belcamp, Md. Mr. John Hoza, a naturalized American citizen (of Czech nationality), was engaged by Dr. Bata, head of the international Bata organization, as manager of the proposed plant and was instructed to make application for the necessary visas and work permits for said instructors, and, if such permits were granted, to begin construction of the manufacturing plant. He was specifically instructed that he was not to begin construction of the said plant unless the United States granted permits for the skilled instructors, etc.

Proper applications were therefore made to the Department of State and the Department of Labor to secure the aforesaid necessary visas and work permits. After an investigation was made by these Departments, the Department of Labor on June 9, 1939, issued a permit to the Bata Shoe Co., Inc., to import 100 Czech nationals for employment at the Bata plant for a period not to exceed 1 year.

Immediately after the permit for the temporary importation of these skilled instructors was obtained, and in reliance thereon, the Bata organization supplied the necessary funds to build the plant. These funds were not obtained even in part from the sale of stock to the public or through loans from banks. Up to the present time approximately $2,000,000 has been expended in plant construction and housing developments for its employees. The Bata organization has always emphasized the welfare of its employees. Along with its construction of manufacturing plants it provides for the housing of its employees and lays great emphasis upon the creation of athletic and other facilities and in the development of a community esprit de corps.

Up to the present time, 72 of the 100 Czech nationals have actually been admitted to this country and have been employed in the Belcamp plant under permits issued by the Department of Labor. Of the remaining 28 workers which the Bata Co. had been authorized to temporarily import, the immigration authorities had already approved the importation of 6-named persons.

Under the tutelage of the 72 skilled instructors the Bata Co. has already employed in the Belcamp plant well over 800 Americans. The approximate pay roll at the present time is $18,000 per week, or $1,000,000 per year, and if the business is permitted to proceed according to original plans it is anticipated that the pay roll will constantly be increased until it reaches approximately $5,000,000 per year in direct salaries to employees of the manufacturing plant.

This has already resulted in the employment of other persons in allied industries, which will increase as the productivity of the Bata plant increases.

At the present rate of production the purchase of raw materials from within the United States will approximate $1,000,000 per year; eventually, as previously mentioned, the cost of such raw materials will probably aggregate around $5,000,000 per year.

Of the 72 Czech nationals now working in the plant, some 25 of them are married and have their families with them.

Under date of December 28, 1939, without the Bata Shoe Co. even knowing that the approval of the permit for the importation of the 100 skilled laborers was being reconsidered, the Commissioner of Immigration revoked the permit as to all but 10 of said workers, notwithstanding the fact that the plant had been built in reliance on the previous approval of said permit and notwithstanding the further fact that 72 of the workers had, with the consent of the United States, already arrived in the United States and been employed in the Bata plant. Newspaper releases concerning the revocation of the permit were immediately given to correspondents who were apparently waiting for their release and articles appeared in all leading newspapers of the country on the morning of December 29 concerning the same. It was only by seeing some of these newspaper articles that officers of the Bata Co. knew anything about the decision, and it was not until December 30 that the company was actually informed of the decision of the Commissioner.

The ruling states that in accordance with its usual practice the Immigration and Naturalization Service had made an investigation at Belcamp in which the Naturalization Service was "assisted by persons familiar through long experience with the process of shoe manufacture," and that as a result of this investigation it was determined that there was "unemployed skilled American labor of the type required to perform" the instruction necessary in the Bata process. The decision directs that 62 of the imported Czechs be separated from the employment of the company on January 10, 1940, a period of scarcely 7 working days from the date of the ruling.

Among the surprising features of the ruling is the fact that an investigation was made by both Labor and State Departments before the original permit was granted, in which those two Departments came to a contrary conclusion. Another surprising feature is that the responsible officers of the Bata Co. were not only not informed that an investigation was being made but were not even interrogated in the process of the investigation; and, so far as appears from the written ruling of the Commissioner of Immigration, available records of other departments of the Government of the United States, which had made extensive investigations in Czechoslovakia of the Bata organization and its manufacturing process and methods, were not even examined.

It is true that certain investigators spent some time at the plant at Belcamp, but officers of the Bata Co. were under the impression that they were there not to investigate the manufacturing process but to check up on the immigration status of persons employed in the organization. Despite the fact that the ruling of the Commissioner states that "the Immigration and Naturalization Service has recently made a thorough investigation of the Bata plant at Belcamp, Md.," the fact remains that while the investigators were in the plant the conveyor system, which had just recently been installed, was not operating with the degree of efficiency, nor was there the coordination in the manufacturing processes, that will eventually prevail. Since the officials of the company were not advised of the purpose of the investigation, they were given no opportunity to explain the peculiar necessity for the temporary use of Czech specialist instructors, nor were they given an opportunity to explain the further coordination of machinery and methods that will ultimately prevail. Nor did the Commissioner of Immigration furnish the company with a copy of his report or even a summary thereof as a basis for any comment or inquiry which the Bata Shoe Co. might desire to make. No hearing of any kind was accorded to anyone interested in sustaining the permit that had already been approved and issued.

On the other hand, it would appear from newspaper reports throughout the country that the Commissioner did grant ex parte hearings to representatives of competing shoe manufacturers in the United States, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and possibly other labor organizations. The nature of the ex parte representations which they made to the Commissioner of Immigration are unknown, but it would certainly seem, in view of the fact that the permit was once issued and that a plant had been built in reliance thereon, that under any accepted principle of fair dealing the company should have been apprised of the charges made and given an opportunity to answer them before the permit was revoked.

The fear that the manufacturing of shoes at the Bata plant in Maryland will increase competition with American shoe manufacturers is not well founded, for the fact is that the Bata organization abroad now exports to the United States approximately 5,000,000 pairs of shoes annually. If hereafter such shoes are manufactured in the United States under American methods, at the American wage scale, the chances are that the competition will be less and not more keen.

Any fear, if there be any, that the creation of a Bata plant will take American money out of the United States is also unfounded, for the Bata organization has a well-established policy of reinvesting its money in the countries where that money is made. It also has a well-established policy of permitting its companies in various countries to be independently managed and operated.

It is apparent even from the most cursory examination that the action of the Immigration Commissioner in revoking the permit, arrived at without any hearing of any kind, is entirely unjustified. There is nothing in the order to indicate that the Bata organization made any misrepresentation of any kind in the securing of the original permit. Since the Department made an investigation before it granted that permit, and was apparently satisfied as to the need for the skilled labor, it is almost incredible that, without even giving notice to the parties concerned, the original approval could be revoked.

The Bata organization, in the first place, decided that it would build a plant in Maryland, provided it could use its own skilled labor in teaching the Bata process to American employees. When the United States granted the permission for the Bata organization to proceed in that manner, the latter built the plant in reliance thereon.

The Bata Co. denies that there are specialists in the United States sufficiently skilled to teach the Bata process. In fact, it maintains that there are no skilled men in the United States who have been trained in that purpose. If the Commissioner of Immigration, therefore, insists on his revocation of the permit, it will probably be necessary for the Bata Co. to close its plant. In that event not only 62 men will be thrown out of employment but in excess of 800 Americans who have already been employed. Furthermore, the respective Bata organization will probably be driven from the United States.

The ruling of the Commissioner says nothing as to what shall happen to the Czech employees, many of whom have families. They have been employed only a short period of time. Undoubtedly great hardship will result to them. If they were not needed as skilled laborers to educate American unskilled labor (most of whom were farmers) in this country, the Department should not have permitted them to come here in the first place.

The manner in which the ruling of December 28, 1939, was arrived at was un-American and contrary to democratic principles. In the interest of fair play to skilled laborers who have come to this country and to the capital invested in this country, in reliance upon a ruling made by the Department of Labor, the very least that could be done by the Commissioner of Immigration is to reopen the entire matter for a full hearing, of which all parties shall have notice and are accorded full opportunity to expression for the presentation of the material facts.

I have discussed this entire matter with people in the various departments, and especially people who originally had these matters in hand officially. It is my understanding from this information that the Bata organization brought new capital from foreign countries to construct the plant at Belcamp, Md., and also to equip it; that the capital represents new capital; and that approximately 1,000 jobs held by Americans are new jobs. Because of the fact that the unemployed question in America is the most important question to be solved by this Congress, I plead for a rehearing and a reconsideration in this matter for the sake of more jobs for unemployed American men and women.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. STEFAN. Let me give you a little picture of Czechoslovakia. Only a year or so ago they had a population of about 15,000,000 people. When they took Sudetenland away from them, when they took Moravia, and other parts away, they left a country there under a dictator protectorate cutting the population to about 8,000,000. They have an immigration quota from that country of around 2,700. Do you know that there are 75,000 of those people registered who want to come to America to live? You cannot blame them but we must look after our own unemployed people first.

The quota is locked from Bohemia. It is locked from some other countries. But you have here a little band of Czechs who are teaching Americans, giving unemployed Americans jobs. They are here with your permission. Now you say to them in a cold-blooded way, "Get out." You let them come here with the belief that they would stay here for at least 1 year. After a few months when they have their factory going you say, "Go back." That is not fair in my opinion.

I want to say again that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE] knows more about this question than any other Member of this House, because the factory which is giving jobs to a thousand people is located in his district. I took this matter up with all of the officials who have something to do with it, and I was informed that the New England delegation would discuss the matter openly on the floor of this House. I am willing to take the challenge and help these Czech people. The New England shoe organizations, the shoe-machine organization, and the organization of the C. I. O., will be responsible for sending these 40 or 50 poor Czech people back to Bohemia. I plead with them not to discriminate against just a handful of Czechs with whom we ought to sympathize. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time to announce to the membership of this House the death yesterday morning of a great American, Donald L. Brown, or Don Brown, as he is better known throughout the aviation industry.

Don Brown was president of the United Aircraft Corporation and a resident of West Hartford, Conn. This morning high officials of the Army, Navy, Civil Aeronautics Authority, and the Governor of Connecticut issued statements paying their tribute to this great leader in the aviation industry, who has done so much to aid in the establishment of a sound national-defense program. Rear Admiral Towers, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, said:

The death of Don Brown, president of the United Aircraft Corporation, is a great loss to aviation. He grew up with it, and by sheer ability and extraordinary qualities of leadership reached the top of his large corporation in a remarkably short space of time. His accomplishments have been of very great value to the national defense and to commercial aviation. His sudden death is a great shock to his many friends in naval aviation.

Major General Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Corps, issued this statement:

The report of the passing of Mr. Don L. Brown, president of the United Aircraft Corporation, was a great personal shock to me and will be received by the entire Air Corps with the sorrow that comes from the loss of a true friend and staunch supporter. Mr. Brown has been intimately associated with aviation since 1915. In 1921 he became assistant factory manager of the Wright Aeronautical Corporation and has been personally interested in the development of the engines of that company and of Pratt & Whitney for the past 19 years. During this time, he has worked closely with Air Corps officers, has understood their problems, and has striven energetically and successfully in the production of power plants for airplanes which have to do so much to maintain the preeminence of American aviation. The entire Air Corps joins the aviation industry in mourning the passing of one of its great pioneers and outstanding gentlemen.

The tribute of Mr. Hinckley, Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, follows:

The untimely death of Donald L. Brown, president of the United Aircraft Corporation, is a severe blow to aviation in the United States. He and the organization he helped establish have contributed immeasurably to the development of aeronautics in this country, civil as well as military, through the development of aircraft engines recognized throughout the world for their efficiency and dependability. Mr. Brown has left an indelible imprint upon an industry with which he was intimately associated for 20 years.

The Honorable Raymond E. Baldwin, Governor of Connecticut, issued a statement, in which he said:

The news of the death of Don L. Brown has brought a deep feeling of sadness. Young, energetic, enthusiastic, highly intelligent, he was one of the outstanding leaders in this community and in the whole State. He had given liberally of his energy and time and thought to State affairs whenever called upon. He was a member of the Aeronautical Development Commission and has done excellent work for our reemployment council. He was a friendly, genial companion. His activity was so great and his interests so varied in the life of this community and State that only the passing days can bring us a full understanding of our loss.

In a letter written to Mrs. Brown, the Honorable Louis Johnson, Acting Secretary of War, said:

Please accept my deepest sympathy on the untimely death of Don L. Brown. I have lost a friend, aviation an illustrious pioneer. The preeminence of the American aircraft engine throughout the world would never have been possible without Don L. Brown. Not only we of the War Department, who have worked with him, but the aviation industry and the Nation as a whole have been impoverished by his death.

In 15 short years Don Brown has aided in the building of a great industry. The United Aircraft Corporation was organized on August 1, 1926, and employed 25 men. At the present time that corporation employs over 6,000 men and has a pay roll of over a million dollars a month.

Far too often we hear expressed on the floor of this House the thought that the great opportunities that once existed in the United States no longer exist. The life of Don Brown is ample proof that this is still the land of opportunity; that there is still opportunity for young men who are willing to apply themselves, to engage in business, and to build great worth-while industries.

I am reminded of an incident that was reported to me a few days ago. Members of this House will recall the neutrality debate during the recent special session. I am informed that at the opening of that special session, Don Brown, who was an important figure in the old aircraft industry, called in his public-relations man and said to him:

While this neutrality debate is going on I do not want you to go near the Hill in Washington. Our Representative has certain definite ideas and, while I do not personally agree with him, I don't want to bother him at a time when his every thought should be toward solving this program for the country's best interest. We can't let our own interests guide our thoughts at this time. Congress alone can decide that for itself and must be given an opportunity to decide what effect repeal of the arms embargo is going to have, not only on the United States, but on the whole world.

In these troubled times we can ill afford to lose such a great American as Donald L. Brown.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I want to give you a few more facts about the Bata situation in this country. Let us have an open investigation of it. I would welcome it. I know the workers would welcome it and the industry would welcome it. Let us face the facts for a minute. Let us look over the whole activity of this company in this country.

I want to show you again that Mr. Bata violated his agreement in allowing these people to come into this country. I also draw your attention to an issue of the New York Times, in which it is stated that Mr. Bata wanted to buy a textile mill in this country. He wanted a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, according to the newspaper story, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation refused that loan because Mr. Bata would not promise to employ American workers.

Let us also face the facts that Mr. Bata later requested that an additional 500—not 100, but with it 600 in all—Czechoslovakians be allowed to come in sometime during last autumn. Five hundred workers would mean their families also, of course; not 100, but 500. That would make 600 that the request was made for, of Czechoslovakian workers, together with their families, to come into this country.

The following is an article in a St. Louis paper on Monday, November 6, 1939, by Mr. Drew Pearson and Mr. Robert S. Allen:

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND
(By Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen)
CZECH SHOE LABOR

The Labor and State Departments have been up against a tough problem recently with the demand that 600 workers and executives of the famous Bata shoe factories of Czechoslovakia be permitted to enter the United States.

Jan Bata, who has done to shoes what Ford has done to automobiles, is setting up a new factory in Harford County, Md., just north of Baltimore. To start the factory he asked for the admission of 100 Czech workers. This roused terrific opposition from both C. I. O. and A. F. of L. shoe unions.

However, Bata had the support of Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland, whose law partner, Maj. Robert Archer, was arranging for the purchase of Bata's land in Maryland. TYDINGS wrote several vigorous letters to the Labor and State Departments demanding entry of the workers, and they finally consented that 100 workers be admitted temporarily.

This has aroused the vehement opposition of some of Senator TYDINGS' colleagues, notably Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, Senator DAVIS, of Pennsylvania, and Representatives TREADWAY and EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, of Massachusetts. They have protested that the admission of shoe workers seriously hurts shoe labor in the United States.

Despite all this, Bata has just asked to import 500 additional personnel into the United States, and Senator TYDINGS made a personal call upon Secretary of State Hull to urge their admission. Specifically, he urged that the immigration laws be waived to admit these 500 in one lump. He urged this on the ground that this group consisted of shoe executives, chemists, and specially trained men, who would not interfere with American labor.

United States labor unions, however, again objected, and even more strenuously. They pointed out that the families of the Bata people also would be admitted, which meant nearer 2,000 rather than 500. They also pointed out that Bata was the Henry Ford of Czechoslovakia; that he manufactured a cheap product which undersold American shoes; and that it was impossible for labor to organize his plants.

Secretary Hull, faced with Senator TYDINGS' plea, consulted his chief of the visa office, Avra Warren, who advised him that if Bata wanted to shift his executive offices to the United States, it should be done through routine channels. Warren urged that if Bata really wanted to set up factories permanently in the United States, his men should get permanent visas, not be given temporary visas.

He pointed out that the Nestle's Chocolate Co. was planning to move to the United States to avoid the war; also, the Belgian mines offices and the Belgian diamond cutters. Warren argued that the transfer of Bata permanently to the United States would enrich this country, and that any immigration visas granted Bata should be on a permanent basis.

Accordingly, the State Department has ruled that the Bata people may receive regular, not temporary, visas if they are able to comply with the requirements of the law.

I am fighting for American jobs and not for jobs for people over there. Our duty is to find employment for the people here.

I know that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN] is working for his farmers; I realize that, because he is always working for his farmers, and also I know he does not comprehend the very great danger in allowing hundreds of trained aliens to come to this country to compete with our unemployed.

I would like to tell you further that, although the officials of the Labor Department were aware of the bad faith shown by officials of the Bata Shoe Co., the Department granted the permit in a letter dated June 9, 1939, but then later withdrew it.

I repeat that Mr. Bata violated the conditions of the permit of entry immediately, for on July 6, 1939, some 23 employees of the Bata firm arrived at Ellis Island without having fulfilled the requirements of the permit, and attempted to cover their entry into the United States by claiming that they were visitors to the world's fair. Each of the 23 admitted upon questioning that he was an employee of the Bata Co. and that he was awaiting orders from Mr. Bata. They had such small sums as $40 as their total cash assets.

Again I want to say that I am amazed at the effort of this company to legalize later the entry of these aliens by attempting to negotiate with the Immigration Service for the permanent entry of 25 chemists, inventors, engineers, executives, and experts in the manufacture of products by the Bata Co.

As I stated before, the Department seemed to sidestep this request by pointing out that the immigration laws required the procurement of a consular immigration visa from the Department of State. As late as November 13, 1939, 7 of these 23 were still in the United States, although they had been granted visitors' visas for a 60-day period only, beginning on July 6, 1939; 2 of the 7 applied for extension, leaving 5 in outright violation of their visas as visitors and with no effort made to obtain legal extension or entry.

I also want to emphasize again the fact of the employment of young and inexperienced workers, that they could not keep up with Mr. Bata's method of production. Our methods are better. Our workers are better. They are citizens of the United States. My ambition and purpose is to fight for their protection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I have often heard this body referred to as the greatest legislative body in the world. I am willing to agree with that statement, but I also want to say that it is one of the most temperamental bodies in the world. We in this body are extravagant to the point of waste or else become economical to the point of being ridiculous in some instances. Every one of us, of course, wants economy as long as it is not false economy, but I believe there has been some false economy practiced in this bill. It does not amount to much money, but the precedent is being established.

The Soil Conservation Service has had approximately $7,000,000 lopped off of the amount of money they told the Budget they needed and which they justified before the Budget and proved they could use profitably. Let us see what they wanted to do with this money. We are saving in this bill, so far as the Soil Conservation Service is concerned, approximately $7,000,000. Let me read some of the conditions that exist by reason of soil erosion in this country; and I am sure everyone here will agree that the soil is our greatest natural resource. I am sure you will also agree that the soil is only as valuable as it is productive; and then I am sure you will agree that it cannot be productive unless the productive properties of the soil are left on top of the ground.

In the western Gulf region of the Soil Conservation Service, comprising all of Arkansas and Louisiana and most of Texas and Oklahoma, recent surveys have disclosed the grave need for the application of soil- and water-conservation measures and other good land-use practices.

The survey report showed that 12,800,000 acres, or about 52 percent of the entire land area in the region, require the immediate application of erosion-control practices if the remaining topsoil is to be saved, and that 70,200,000 acres, or about 28 percent should have preventive measures applied so that this land will not fall prey to the destructive forces of erosion. Thus it is seen that about 80 percent of the entire area, or 199,000,000 acres, needs to have conservation measures applied.

To the extent that the lopping off of this $7,000,000 has decreased the fund at their disposal, to that extent must their efforts be curtailed, and I say that the knocking off of this sum is false economy. The Soil Conservation Service has not got as much money this year as it had last year. In this connection we must remember that Congress passed an act which provided that if States passed enabling legislation there could be created in the States throughout this country soil-conservation districts. The States have barely got to the place where that enabling legislation has been passed. I will give you some figures which indicate the present need. Current estimates based on the present status of district organizations indicate that there will be 423 districts requesting assistance from the Soil Conservation Service in 1941. Many of them comprise several counties. Now, it is just "pat" on the face of the thing that they will need more money in 1941 than they needed in 1940 if they are to cooperate with many of these 423 districts which were created under the hope held out to the States through legislation we passed; that if they did pass enabling legislation and these districts were created, that the Federal Government would cooperate with them. To the extent that new districts have been created they need more money. They say they need only $7,000,000 more than the Budget was willing to allow. False economy, I call it.

The three necessities of life—food, clothing, and shelter—come directly or indirectly from the topsoil. The Garden of Eden at one time must have been the most beautiful place on earth; the good things of life must have been more abundant there than any other place on the top side of this earth. We now know where the Garden of Eden was located. There is not a sprig of grass there now; it is arid desert. Erosion? Sure. It could happen to us. Maybe we would not turn into a desert, but we can become an arid country quickly if we do not go on with this important job of holding the water on the land where it hits the land and stopping its washing into the Gulf of Mexico and into the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans.

Soil erosion costs the farmers and ranchers of the United States not less than $400,000,000 annually. This means a loss of more than $7.50 for every man, woman, and child living in rural areas. Soil erosion has already ruined about 50,000,000 acres of farm land for practical and possible cultivation. This represents a loss of more than 320,000 farms equal in size to the 156-acre average for all United States farms. Soil erosion where active seriously reduces, of course, the per-acre crop yields, despite improved cropping and improved seed and fertilization. Soil erosion causes 750,000,000 tons of solid matter to be dumped into the Gulf of Mexico alone every year—750,000,000 tons. The destruction of the soil does not, of course, mean only a loss in dollars.

It means human suffering; living standards decline; churches, schools, and other necessary institutions suffer. The security once offered by productive fields vanishes. Opportunity wanes. Faith is shaken. Hope falters. Even liberty and democracy are menaced for $7,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, an amendment will be offered to restore this sum. Whether or not this will be done, of course, I do not know. Amendments will be offered to restore other items of the bill which have been cut out.

I take up the subject now of disposition of surplus commodities. The Budget in a fit of generosity allowed $113,000,000 to stay in this bill for that purpose. The Appropriations Committee, in its wisdom, cut this out. That money would have gone largely for the development of the so-called stamp plan for the distribution of surplus commodities. I hear a lot of talk on the floor about not doing anything that is going to make businessmen afraid, you must have the confidence of business, and so forth. Let me say to those who are interested in that side of the problem that the present system of distributing surplus commodities upon the stamp plan has the endorsement of every businessman who has ever had opportunity to touch it. No one will argue that it is not a better system of distribution for surplus commodities than any other system yet devised, and no one will argue that by reason of our cock-eyed distribution system we do not need something to help distribute surplus commodities.

Why save this money? For what purpose? Are we going to save this $113,000,000 to build a battleship or to increase the standing army? I am not so much in sympathy with the big program for national defense. Who is coming over here? They could not get here, in the first place, and they could not stay here after they got here. I am willing to go along with a little relief for the industrial centers of the United States if they have to build some ships, but not to the extent it is going to hamper and cripple the internal development of this Nation. Do not talk to me about lending money to Finland or to the suffering people of China when the people in my district are suffering. [Applause.] As long as the pruning knife falls so deeply into appropriations that we cannot afford to spend any money for the distribution of surplus commodities do not ask me to lend foreigners any money. I will not be with you, and I am liable not to be with you on your national-defense program.

I do not think that there is anything more important than the peace, the tranquillity, and the happiness of our own people.

As I said at the outset, this is a great body, but we swing from one extreme to the other. When I came to this body about 6 years ago I stood on the floor of the House and saw appropriated $4,880,000,000 in about 2 hours. Now then, we are squealing and squalling and hollering trying to save $7,000,000 at the expense of the soil.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. To the gentleman's knowledge, is not this stamp plan to distribute surplus commodities the first attempt to answer the critics of the administration and the only actual thing that has been done to make consumption meet production? We always hear the argument that there is not overproduction; it is underconsumption. This method would raise the consumption of our products in our own country.

Mr. NICHOLS. Not only that, but it answers the other critics of the administration who say that we have gone so much into business that private business does not have a chance to function because the Government is doing it all.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I hope that you and my colleagues will be interested in a bill I am introducing this afternoon. I cannot promise that the draftsmanship, which is my own, is perfect by any means, but, on the other hand, I think the principles of it may be of interest to the membership.

This bill is entitled "The Exchange Dumping Tax Act" and reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tariff Act of 1930 (Public Law 361, 71st Cong.), as amended, is hereby further amended by adding a new section after section 522 thereof, as follows:

"522-2 (a) Whenever the value of the currency of any foreign state, in terms of the currency of the United States as shall be determined in accordance with section 522 hereof, shall have declined in excess of 5 percent from the value of such foreign currency so determined to have been in effect on December 31, 1934, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles when imported from such foreign country into the United States, or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands), a tax according to the value of such article, which shall be in proportion to the ratio which the difference between the value of such foreign currency on December 31, 1934, and the value of such foreign currency on the date of release from customs custody to the consignee or his agent shall bear to the value of such foreign currency on the date of such release. This tax shall be levied and collected and paid in addition to and not in lieu of any other tax imposed according to law.

"(b) This tax shall be designated as 'The Exchange Dumping Tax.'"

Mr. Chairman, I have introduced this bill because, as every Member of the House knows, since the negotiation of trade treaties under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act of 1934 nearly all of the countries that have been parties to such agreements with the United States have very materially reduced their exchange rate with the United States, very largely through manipulation or currency control. I have before me the figures up to yesterday, which show the depreciation of several foreign currencies and the antidumping tax that would be applied under the terms of my bill.

Table showing devaluation of certain foreign currencies in terms of United States dollars since Dec. 31, 1934, and proposed ad valorem exchange dumping tax

Country	Currency	Value in United States dollars			Currency devalued	Estimated current proposed tax
		Dec. 31, 1934	Jan. 29, 1940	Difference
United Kingdom	Pound sterling	4.94	3.99	0.95	Percent 19	Percent 23.8
France	Franc	.0662	.02265	.04355	66	183
Sweden	Krona	.2550	.2383	.0167	6.5	7
Italy	Lira	.0875	.0505	.03525	41	69.5
Finland	Finnmark	.0219	.0185	.0034	15.5	18.3
Holland	Gulden	.6782	.5310	.1472	22	27.7
Japan	Yen	.2876	.2349	.0527	18	22.4
Switzerland	Franc	.3249	.2243	.1006	31	44.6

The effect of such devaluations is in many cases to negative any tariff that may exist, even though that tariff may not have been reduced by the reciprocal-trade agreements. On duty-free items it naturally gives a big discount on purchases made abroad. On goods which we must sell to foreign countries it does the reverse and places a premium against our merchandise and makes it hard for us to sell abroad, especially in items of current world trade.

We must contemplate also the probable effect that further reductions in exchange rates will have upon our commerce when wars shall be won or lost and the world again scrambles for markets. We have bound the status of many tariff items in reciprocal-trade agreements. When millions of men now in armed forces return to work we are in a position to become a dumping ground for foreign goods in a really big way. Trade agreements already negotiated make provision for discriminatory examination into discriminating exchange controls but it is quite likely that these discriminations will have worked havoc upon us before a review can have been made.

I hope the Members of the House will take an interest in the principles of this bill. If someone has a better suggestion than this, I am entirely modest concerning the efficacy of my own bill and I shall be glad to cooperate with anyone who can propose a better one.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GEHRMANN].

Mr. GEHRMANN. Mr. Chairman, I certainly agree with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS], who spoke a few moments ago, that it is not right that the entire additional appropriation for the Army and Navy and other parts of our national defense should be taken out of agriculture. This bill is practically cut in two as compared with last year's bill. While I did not agree with some of the appropriations made in last year's bill, certainly many items are taken out of this bill that should be restored, such as the item referring to surplus commodities. No one can find any fault with this distribution of surplus commodities because it affects and benefits not only the farmers of every section of the country but also the people that are waiting for something to eat. It also helps to a large extent the communities that will be obliged to furnish relief in some form to those unfortunate people. I believe this item should be restored.

The stamp plan, as was stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] has been a wonderful one. I know, at least, that all the larger cities in my district have clamored for it, and I have yet to find a single businessman who formerly criticized the distribution of surplus commodities who does not now feel that that is the right way to do it. I believe that provision should be restored to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to say a few words about this agricultural appropriation bill.

I am willing to go along with the economy program, but, if we are going to economize, I think it is absolutely unfair to take most of the savings that this Congress hopes to make out of the farmers and those unfortunate people unable to find a job and are dependent on positions provided by the Government or upon direct relief from some Government agency. The W. P. A. appropriation will come up later, and I hope to be able to get some time to express my views on that appropriation bill. The few minutes I have I wish to devote to this agricultural appropriation bill which is now under consideration.

This bill makes no provision for parity payments, as the Agricultural Adjustment Act provides should be made when farm products which come under the Agricultural Act fall below 75 percent of parity. In spite of the fact that by far the largest single agricultural industry, which is the dairy industry, is left out in the cold and has not received any consideration in the Agricultural Act, nevertheless I have constantly supported the principle of parity payments and have done everything possible to assist in the passage of the money necessary for parity payments.

Too many people, including most of the newspapers, are constantly pointing out the huge sums appropriated for agriculture. Last year the amount was over $1,000,000,000, and the public, through the press and speeches by Members of Congress and others, have made the people believe that this entire huge sum is appropriated as a direct grant or gift to the farmers. That, of course, is very unfair, and that impression should not be permitted to prevail. There is about as much truth in the statement that last year the farmers of the country received over $1,000,000,000 in gratuities as there is in the fact that many consumers believe that out of the 14 cents they pay for a quart of milk in the cities the farmer receives at least 10 cents or more. When we separate the agricultural appropriations we find that a very large percentage of the total amount is for other than agricultural purposes, which include such large items as roads and forestry.

I wish to further point out that parity payments, if and when they are made, should not in fairness be considered as gifts or gratuities. I look at them as a partial restitution of import duties on agricultural products, which we all know are coming in here with comparatively less protection than industrial products are permitted to be imported.

I have not the time to go into all these details, but my main purpose in getting this time on the floor is to ask the Members of Congress, and especially those interested in the present Agricultural Act, which designates five agricultural products as basic commodities, to include dairying as the sixth basic commodity.

Let me say here that, while I do not agree with the present agricultural program, it has been made plain here today that we are about to try something else, and I believe that the only real agricultural program is either the plan of parity payments or a plan based on the cost-of-production principle. I hope that before this Congress adjourns one of these plans will be enacted into law. However, while we are working under this program, I plead with the Members at least to consider the largest single agricultural industry—namely, the dairy industry—as part of this bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEHRMANN. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. I am pleased to hear the gentleman's remarks, and I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the reduction in the soil-conservation appropriation referred to by our colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS]. This cut is approximately $3,000,000 in one phase of the soil-conservation program. This program is carried out in every State of the United States, according to the testimony, and this reduction alone, small as it seems, will mean an actual reduction of 15 percent in the work done on the farms under the soil-conservation program, and a 20-percent reduction throughout the United States in supervisory personnel. This is what it will mean to the farmers of the United States.

Mr. GEHRMANN. I am in favor of continuing that appropriation.

The agricultural statistics of 1939, prepared by the United States Department of Agriculture, shows that the dairy industry, which includes nothing except milk and its products, has a value at least equal to the two next largest commodities—namely, corn and wheat. The value of the 6 products are as follows, according to the 1937 agricultural statistics:

Milk and its products.....	$2,013,340,000
Corn	1,279,711,000
Wheat	842,874,000
Cotton	796,179,000
Tobacco	319,465,000
Rice	35,132,000

To the value of dairy products, of course, should be added the value of the livestock, such as veal calves, heifers, and dairy cows sold, and other so-called byproducts incident to this industry. That, I am sure, would make the total value of the dairy industry not less than two and one-half billion dollars.

I feel that Representatives from dairy States, whose farmers have been left out in the cold without any aid except the surplus-commodity provision, should support an amendment, which I am sure will be offered, to provide parity payments, as promised to the farmers under the Agricultural Act. But, first, I believe we should have a promise from those very much interested in parity-payment provisions that they will agree to include dairying as a basic commodity.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, Congressman HULL, and myself have introduced two bills, which are identical, and which carry out the wishes of the dairy farmers in several States where dairying is the major industry.

The farmers in these States, which include Wisconsin, part of Michigan, Minnesota, and part of Iowa, as well as Illinois, have held meetings during the last several years, and they finally agreed on a program which is embodied in the bills introduced by my colleague and myself. These bills are H. R. 6500 and H. R. 6530. Shortly before adjournment of the regular session the Committee on Agriculture appointed a subcommittee to hold hearings on these bills. I hope that this subcommittee will report these bills to the whole committee and that the whole committee will give this most important matter due consideration at an early date so that the dairy farmers may be included as a basic commodity along with the other five commodities.

I met with a great many farmers of not only my own district but from all over the State of Wisconsin, and their earnest advice to me was to attempt to organize the Representatives in Congress from dairy sections to the extent that support for parity payments be withheld unless those that are now benefiting from parity payments, loans, and otherwise, as provided in the Agricultural Act, agree to be fair and include the largest of all agricultural commodities.

I am sure that no one here can state that the Members from dairy sections have been unfair. It is really surprising to a great many observers that the dairy farmers of this Nation and their Representatives have been patient enough to go along with the administration's agricultural policy from year to year, hoping constantly that the next bill would recognize the dairy industry. Our patience is about exhausted, and I do not know whether I would dare to support any longer the fight for parity payments and other provisions of the agricultural bill unless we have assurance that dairying will be declared a basic commodity. I hope that assurance can be given the representatives of dairy sections before the test vote comes on appropriations for parity payments.

Some of my Wisconsin colleagues did not support parity payments last year because they realized and believed that we had waited long enough to have this Congress recognize the dairy industry as a basic commodity. In spite of that refusal year after year, up until last year, our entire Wisconsin delegation have supported the agricultural program and the fight for parity payments. Congressman Hull and myself supported it again last year, but I will not promise to support it this year unless some assurance is given that the leaders of this Congress, who are handling this legislation, will assist us in passing the two bills mentioned before, which are now before the Subcommittee on Agriculture. These bills introduced by my colleague and myself seek no special privilege or advantage that the other five commodities have not enjoyed for quite a number of years, and I wish to read from the bill section 2, which is the declaration of policy:

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the further policy of Congress to extend and apply the underlying principles of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, and the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, to the dairy industry and to utilize the administrative agencies established thereunder, insofar as is practicable, for the purpose of encouraging the development and adoption of sound dairy practices in the maintenance of healthy and efficient herds, the improvement in the quality of milk, stabilization of marketing conditions through orderly marketing of adequate supplies, and the prevention of burdensome surpluses; to accomplish these purposes through the encouragement of herd-improvement practices through breeding and testing and disease eradication and the sanitary production and care of milk; to assist in the marketing of dairy products for domestic consumption and export; and to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in dairy products to the extent necessary to provide an orderly, adequate, and balanced flow of milk and its products in such commerce through the maintenance of an adequate production capacity by establishing herd or marketing quotas, assist dairymen to obtain, insofar as possible, parity prices for milk and its products and parity of income, and assist consumers to obtain an adequate and steady supply of such commodities at fair prices.

All through this bill it simply adds milk and its products to corn, wheat, cotton, rice, and tobacco. This bill also establishes marketing quotas which are entirely under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture. The allotments are based on the national cow population, and the average production per cow is the yardstick by which allotments are made. These will be found on pages 14 and 15 of the bills mentioned. I hope that every Member of Congress will carefully read one of these dairy bills before they vote on the bill now under consideration and decide on how they will vote on the amendments that will be offered which attempt to provide for parity payments.

As stated before, no one can accuse me of not being fair, and I want to continue to be fair, but in justice to the thousands of farmers I represent, whose main income depends on the dairy cow, it will be almost impossible to longer support funds for parity payments unless the dairy farmer is treated equally along with the other so-called basic commodities. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MILLS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I am a firm believer in national economy, but when I say this I mean that I do not believe in wasting the people's money; not that I do not believe in spending the taxpayers' money to purchase certain benefits which are of inestimable value to the taxpayers.

There are approximately 6,812,000 farms in this country, but I am sure every Member of this body will agree with me that we, when we pass legislation which helps the farmer, we also help all other citizens of our Nation, as a prosperous agricultural class is certainly a requisite to a sound and prosperous nation; therefore, before we begin arbitrarily to cut this expenditure and that, we must stop and consider just what these so-called economies will cost us in the end—and when I say "us" I mean the American people as a whole. I believe that some reductions as set forth in this proposed legislation will cost us dearly, and that in the end, if we pass this measure as it stands, we shall have proved to be, in the words of the old adage, "pennywise and pound foolish."

May I for a moment call your attention to the proposed cut of $3,629,834 in the Soil Conservation Service appropriation as against the appropriation for this same agency last year. One phase of the Soil Conservation Service's work is the prevention of soil erosion and the restoration of fertility to the soil. Our farmers naturally want to make a success of their farming, and you will find that they are more than willing to work and are eager to try the best methods to preserve their primary asset, the soil itself; however, they cannot do this without assistance, and the manner in which they have cooperated with the Soil Conservation Service shows how grateful they are for such assistance. The farmers must have technical help and advice if they are going to prevent the ruin of their land in sections where soil erosion is a problem, and yet the reduction of the Soil Conservation funds will mean curtailment of some of this work.

What the results of such curtailment would be is painfully obvious. Many farms will go to wrack and ruin, with consequent loss not only to the owner but to the Nation, which will have lost a valuable productive unit with every farm which ceases to operate. Further, we shall have ceased to care for the very soil which supports our country and our people.

And what will happen to the people who thus lose their farms and their means of earning a livelihood? They will form another unemployed class, and one untrained for industrial pursuits, even could they find employment in the city, which all of them could not. Mr. Chairman, if we take away from the farmers the help they desperately need at this time, we shall be creating another unemployed group for which we shall find ourselves legislating a few years hence. Is it not in the end the greater economy to protect our farms and our farmers by spending a few dollars now rather than waiting until we have to feed hungry families out of public funds?

It is further proposed that we appropriate no funds whatsoever for the disposal of surplus commodities, by which is meant the purchasing from the farmer of products he cannot sell and the distributing of these foodstuffs to hungry families.

In this we shall grossly injure both the farmer who will be left with crops rotting his bins, and the poor man who has no work, no money, no food. Mr. Chairman, I tell you that you cannot leave people to starve in a land of plenty without inviting a wave of crime and a storm of popular protest. And isn't the most practical way to feed the hungry just this plan of using surplus crops for this purpose?

The bill which we are today considering makes no provision whatsoever for parity payments to farmers, although we know that we cannot have prosperous farmers until we see to it that the farmer gets as much for what he sells as he must pay for what he buys. Some means must be found to secure parity prices for the farmers or there will be many farms in this country which will cease to operate, many families that will lose all source of income.

With every separate phase of this legislation which we consider we find the same story; that is, that after years of following a program of help to the farmer we suddenly propose to cut down on certain types of assistance while we do away with others altogether. This help was given the farmer in the first place because he needed it desperately and because it was recognized that not only the farmer but the rest of the country would benefit from this help. Today the farmer is still in need of assistance and protection.

The passage of this measure as it stands, particularly unless some adequate provision is made for parity payments, would be a staggering blow to American agriculture as a whole, and through it to American business and industry. We cannot achieve a healthy economic system without making adequate provision for our farmers, and if we are not moved by humanitarian considerations—by the picture of whole families moving from their farms which are also their beloved homes, to go cold and hungry, looking for work in alien fields and cities—then at least the thought of what an impoverished farm class will do to our economic set-up must make us reconsider and alter this bill before it is too late. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, today we are considering one of the truly important bills of this session of Congress, the appropriation for the Department of Agriculture. We provide in this bill the funds for the farm program, soil conservation, and the numerous activities of the Department of Agriculture. I am vitally concerned about the problems of agriculture; I am deeply disappointed about some of the provisions of this bill, and I take this opportunity to register my protest against those provisions and urge your support of a more comprehensive program for agriculture, than the bill as reported by the committee affords. I appreciate my membership on the Appropriations Committee, and I regret to find myself unalterably opposed to the actions of the committee in regard to several items in the bill. I cannot speak for the committee, but I can and must speak for myself.

The Budget cut the request of the Department of Agriculture very severely—too drastically, in my opinion; then along came the Agricultural Subcommittee on Appropriations and cut the request of the Department of Agriculture even more; and then along came the full Committee on Appropriations this morning and cut even deeper than the subcommittee had cut.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]—and there is no abler Member of the House than he—paid a very glowing tribute to the bill and to the members of the Subcommittee on Agriculture.

I could pay a glowing tribute, if I had the time, to the men who compose the membership of that subcommittee, but to save my life I cannot pay a tribute of any kind to the bill that was brought in by the subcommittee, or to the bill which was reported to the House by the whole Committee on Appropriations, because I feel that the bill represents a shortsightedness that is unworthy of the committee. I am one of those who did not favor the drastic cuts that were made by the committee, and I am one of those who will not favor those cuts when we read this bill and are permitted to offer amendments to it.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. This bill almost cuts last year's appropriation 50 percent; does it not?

Mr. MAHON. I am not sure of all the figures, but the cut is very drastic.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman does not believe in taking the entire economy program out on the farmers of the United States?

Mr. MAHON. I do not. The gentleman is correct.

FARM TENANCY

In the next place, I would like to call attention to the action taken on the farm-tenant purchase program. The Budget cut the item from $40,000,000 last year to $25,000,000 this year, and now comes the committee and cuts it out entirely. There have been those who say that we cannot solve the farm problem in this manner, and that we should quit trying to help people along the road to home ownership by the farm-tenant purchase program. I do not agree with that philosophy. To close the door to the only ray of light and hope that many tenant farmers have seems to me to be not only cruel but poor policy. What we should be doing is expanding that program rather than taking from the tenant farmer what little hope he may have that the Government will assist him in his ambition to own a home for himself and family. The program is in its infancy and has been greatly restricted heretofore. My hope has been that the program would be expanded and improved from year to year.

Gentlemen, there can never be a sound and prosperous agriculture unless people are enabled to own their farm homes. This is of vital importance not only to the farmer but to the Nation as well. Of course, the program cannot fully succeed without an increase in farm income.

My friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has referred to the fact that in committee the vote to cut this farm-tenant purchase item was about 25 to 9. I am glad that I can be recorded in the nine who voted against the elimination of the item and who voted for a program of home ownership on the farm.

PARITY PAYMENTS

I want to discuss the question of parity payments. Of course, we include nearly $500,000,000 in this bill for soil-conservation payments, but parity payments ought to be included also. I offered an amendment in the Appropriations Committee for the restoration of the program of parity payments which we had last year and the year before. The amendment I offered provided for $225,000,000 for parity payments, which was the sum appropriated by Congress last year. My amendment was promptly voted down. That I regret very much.

In 1938 we passed an agricultural bill and we announced the policy of parity for the farmer. We did not propose a gift to the farmer, mind you, but a payment to partially offset the loss he is taking by reason of an unfair and unbalanced tariff. We have made provision for parity payments in the bill for the last 2 years, and there was no reason for the farmer to feel it would not be in the Budget this year and in the bill this year. Some say, however, that the war situation might cause a greater price for agricultural commodities, which most people doubt and which I doubt, and that there may not be any necessity for this parity payment. Let me point out, however, that the parity payment provision provides that if the price of agricultural commodities is less than 75 percent of parity, then the appropriation will be utilized to make up the deficiency between the actual price of certain farm products and 75 percent of parity. Certainly we could do no less than that. We ought to do more. I think if we are to play fair with the farm population of this country in their basic relationship to the economy of the Nation before this session is over, Congress must restore the parity payment program of the past couple of years.

If the Agriculture Committee finds other and better ways to raise the price of agricultural commodities, that is all right, but to cut out from under agriculture this prop, so to speak, and offer no other substitute and no other prop in its stead, is contrary to good public policy and represents short-sightedness and poor economy. I will not agree to destroying what we have until we have found a substitute that is better.

Frankly, I have been very much disappointed with the administration of some aspects of the present farm program. I vigorously opposed some of the provisions of the farm act which Congress passed in 1938. A man who thinks that the present farm program is perfect is sadly misinformed. I do not think it inappropriate to again point out to the House at this time the seriousness of the problem of displacement of farm families from the farm. This tendency is prevalent throughout the Farm Belt.

I have outspokenly, in Texas and in Washington, advocated a farm program that would mutually encourage both landlord and tenant in the utilization of a normal-sized farm unit in every farm community. The utilization of a well-balanced number of families on the farm lands of the Nation and not the displacement of families should be the aim of our agricultural program. In other words, the program should be so worked out that it would be to the mutual advantage of both landlord and tenant to retain people on the farm rather than displace them. Of course, in this bill we are considering an appropriation for agriculture and not agricultural legislation. The legislation necessarily must be first considered and brought to the House by the Committee on Agriculture.

SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE

I condemn the cuts that have been made by the Budget and by the committee in the soil-conservation item for the demonstrational work of the soil-conservation program and for other aspects of the program of soil conservation, being ably administered under the leadership of Dr. H. H. Bennett. I am going to support amendments designed to restore funds for this vitally important and useful program.

I think there is something to the cry about the conservation of the topsoil, and I think any money we spend, however great it may be, to retain what resources we have left is money well spent, good economy, and good common sense.

Mind you, in criticizing this appropriation bill I do not wish to minimize the many good features it contains. I could refer to the provisions regarding the rural-electrification program, in which I am so much interested, and many other items, if I had the time. And I hope when this bill is read for amendment, and as it takes its devious course through the House and through the Senate, we will be able to make up for some of these drastic cuts that have been made by restoring and shaping up this bill in a way that will deal properly with the great agricultural interests of this country; and when I speak of agricultural interests I speak not only of the 30,000,000 people who live on the farms, but I speak also of the 130,000,000 people whose future is dependent upon the well-being of agriculture and upon the conservation of the soil and the conservation of the people who live on that soil.

I know that in an appropriation bill we cannot cure the ills of agriculture. We cannot legislate. That must be done by the Committee on Agriculture and by the House following its leadership, but we can do that which comes to our lot when the opportunity is presented. We must go forward with this agricultural appropriation bill in such a way that we will not destroy the hope of the farmer, but rather give him continued assurance that he will have the support of the Congress in endeavoring to work out his welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the three great failures of the New Deal are, first, its inability to solve the unemployment problem, after an expenditure of $25,000,000,000; second, the inability of the New Deal to solve the farm problem, after huge expenditures, and to increase the price of farm products; third, the utter lack of a fiscal policy. There is no fiscal policy. Whatever fiscal policy there is, it does not stick any more than a custard pie would stick if you would try to nail it to the wall.

The Roosevelt farm promises and the Roosevelt farm performances have now quarreled and parted. The Roosevelt farm forces today have thrown overboard all efforts to pay the American farmers a parity price for this year's crop. They reached this decision in spite of the fact that the farm income is $3,000,000,000 below that of 1929, and the further fact that hogs yesterday sold at prices ranging from a low of $4.25 at Sioux City to a top of $5.90 in Chicago.

That President Roosevelt did not propose to keep his promises to the farmers this year, but chose instead to use the money that the farmer received last year to build a bigger Navy, is proven by the increased Budget of hundreds of millions of dollars for armaments and naval appropriations, and his deliberate failure to include any appropriation whatever for parity payments in his Budget message this year.

Not even Mr. Roosevelt any longer contends that this is a depression or even a recession. The American farmer has come to learn that at the end of the second Roosevelt term, with 10,000,000 individual workers unemployed, what we are suffering today is just a good old-fashioned dose of Democratic hard times.

There is no true economy to be effected in depressing the farm income of the United States in order to build up a super-navy, or even to hold our foreign trade. The State of Illinois, or the State of Iowa, is a far better and safer market for American industrial goods than is either the country or nation of Iraq or Iran.

Restore the purchasing power of the Illinois corn and hog raiser, the Kansas wheat grower, the Wisconsin dairy farmer, the Southern cotton planter, and the American agriculturist in general to a point where their purchases will put dinner pails in the hands of the unemployed, and there will not be enough mines, mills, or factories in the land to supply their wants and needs for decades to come.

There will be no restoration to normal industrial activity until the domestic markets for agricultural products are restored to the American farmers, and our farmers are paid a decent American price for that portion of their crops domestically consumed.

Our farm program can best be described as an Alice-in-Wonderland farm policy. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been appropriated and spent for the purpose of putting new lands into cultivation and production. Other hundreds of millions of dollars have been appropriated and spent to take lands out of cultivation and production, and then more hundreds of millions of dollars are used to subsidize the farmers for not growing crops on lands already in production. That has been the policy of the administration for the past 7 or 8 years, and farm prices are today much lower than between 1921 and 1931 under Republican administrations.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I would rather proceed, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. I want to take the remaining time to discuss the disastrous cotton situation. I do not apologize for doing that, although we do not produce any cotton up in Dutchess County, N. Y. I speak about it because you Democratic Members of Congress from the Southern Cotton States refuse to present the facts to your own people, and they do not get the facts, because, unfortunately, there is only a one-party government in most of the Cotton States of the South.

The southern Members of Congress, due to their party loyalty, are afraid to tell the truth about the deplorable cotton situation in our own country, but the abrogation of our trade treaty with Japan, effective January 26, is just another blow to King Cotton.

The President has succeeded, by placing countervailing duties on Germany and Italy, in losing the export market of almost 2,000,000 bales of cotton annually to those two countries. Now it is proposed, by similar action against Japan or even going further and placing economic sanctions on trade with Japan, to destroy our biggest remaining market for cotton exports.

The southern planters have been given the kiss of death by the administration's foreign policy, and its continuation will mean a vanishing market for our cotton export trade from the South, which heretofore has constituted its greatest wealth. The Southern Cotton States have been fighting to build up the export markets for American cotton for the past 100 years, and for nearly 100 years American cotton exports have maintained the balance of trade between the United States and the outside world. Today, under this administration, instead of exporting 10,000,000 bales as we did prior to 1932, our exports have dropped to one-third of that amount.

We now find that Great Britain is limiting her purchases of American cotton and making bulk purchases in Brazil, India, and Egypt, and then selling her present warehouse cotton stocks to the neutral nations of Europe under a depreciated pound, thus depriving our cotton farmers of those markets and precluding the sale of American cotton in practically every world market.

A long-range cotton economy for the United States will not be complete without the adoption of a two-price system for this staple. We must eliminate Federal governmental control of production, see that the American cotton planters are paid a fair American price for that portion of the cotton crop consumed in the United States, and sell our exportable surplus to all nations at whatever prices it can be sold.

Mr. Chairman, under consent granted, I include an interesting letter written by Mr. J. E. McDonald, who is commissioner of agriculture for the department of agriculture in the State of Texas.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, STATE OF TEXAS,
Austin, January 29, 1940.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH, M. C.,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FISH: Col. C. C. Hanson, Raleigh Hotel, Washington, D. C., who is secretary for the Southern Commissioners of Agriculture Association, mailed me copy of your statement issued for release on Friday, January 26, and I have read the same with sincere appreciation. I had 100 copies made, as per enclosed, and mailed same to the Texas newspapers and association members.

For 7 years I have consistently pointed out the fallacies of the A. A. A. cotton program, and during this time have sponsored what is known as the Clair domestic-allotment plan for agriculture, presented by Francis J. Clair, formerly of New York but now of Washington.

Mr. FISH, cotton is the "kingpin" of American agriculture; cotton is the greatest crop grown by man; cotton and cottonseed furnish food and raiment for both man and beast; cotton is the most non-perishable crop; cotton is the most readily accepted collateral, the most easily liquidated.

The A. A. A. cotton program is encouraging foreign production, sur-rendering foreign markets, forcing the cotton farmer into a state of peasantry such as has come to some of the older countries, and once the farmer loses his foreign cotton markets and forced out of the cotton-growing business he will be compelled to invade the fields of other producers, which will further demoralize American agriculture.

Manufacture, commerce, and transportation suffer or prosper with agriculture, therefore the agricultural problem even more vitally concerns those engaged in other American industries than it does the farmer himself.

There can be no general prosperity and happiness in this Nation of ours so long as the farmer does not receive parity prices for that portion of his crop domestically consumed.

This Congress should place the Clair domestic-allotment plan on the statutes, making it available to the growers of each and every commodity, if and when the producers thereof worked out and presented a national program for their commodity, which program would provide that the commodity finance its own program, such as cotton finance cotton, wheat finance wheat, and so forth.

Money to finance the cotton program should be through the imposition of an excise tax on the finished cotton goods first sale from processor.

Illustration: A spinner invoicing out $100 worth of cotton goods, there would be added perhaps a 10-percent excise tax, making the collection $110. The $10 to be sent to the United States Treasury, deposited, earmarked, and by the Congress appropriated out and made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for making adjustment payments, which adjustment payments would represent the difference between the world market price and the announced parity price on that portion of the farmer's cotton domestically consumed. The excise tax coming on the finished product, which is several times the price of the raw product, would be so nominal that sufficient money could be provided without being a burden on anyone. By this means the spinner would not have his money invested and there would be no excuse for profiteering or pyramiding.

The domestic-allotment plan would not disturb our present wonderful cotton-marketing system and the passage of the domestic-allotment plan for cotton should not, and would not, incur the opposition of the cotton spinner or cotton merchant.

The Clair domestic-allotment plan, adopted and wisely administered, would merely extend tariff protection and benefits to the industry of agriculture, and by the farmer receiving parity prices he would have purchasing power with which to support other American industries.

The one thing that has retarded economic recovery more than any other one thing is the disparity between the price of agricultural and industrial things and the wage of organized industrial labor as compared to the wage of unorganized agricultural labor. The one most imperative thing before the American Congress is to place on the statutes an agricultural law which will remove this disparity by providing parity prices.

Parity prices would affect the greatest exchange of the products of farm and factory and with the greatest exchange of the products of farm and factory, there would be the greatest employment on the farm, in the factory, and in commerce.

Solution of the agricultural problem is not a difficult one. Mr. Clair can in 15 minutes convince any intelligent man what the trouble is with agriculture and give the solution. The real problem is getting some Member of Congress who has sense enough to realize that taking the lead in solving the agricultural problem gives him the greatest opportunity to serve the Nation and at the same time gives him national political prestige.

Your release gives me encouragement and I want to assure you of my assistance in your endeavors to place on the statutes a constructive agricultural law and I will be pleased to have you write me.

With appreciation and kindest regards, I am

Very sincerely,

J. E. McDONALD,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration today has to do with one of two basic problems of the United States.

The unemployment problem and the problem of low agricultural income spring primarily, in my judgment, from two causes: The first is the presence of monopoly in the economy which enables those enterprises which are organized as monopolies to take more than their fair share of the flow of consumer purchasing power, and the other is the increase of productive capacity at a more rapid rate than the power of the people to consume increases. In the last few months industrial production has climbed to above the 1929 level, but employment has increased only about one-quarter as rapidly. To drastically curtail Government's contribution to farm income or income of the unemployed at this time will, in my judgment, lead to most serious consequences. Already we have a distinct gap between the wealth produced on the one hand, and the capacity of the people to consume it upon the other. We should not make it worse.

In like manner, in the case of agriculture, we have a situation where we have what we call agricultural surpluses, wealth already produced, actual, real food available to the people, and yet millions of our people do not have purchasing power with which to buy that food.

The other day a gentleman on the Republican side of the aisle made a speech that interested me very much. In that speech he said that you cannot create purchasing power by increasing the public debt. He was right, of course, for the only way that real purchasing power is created is by the production of real wealth. But, as a matter of fact we do not barter that wealth around among ourselves, but we exchange it by means of tokens which we call money. Mostly they are figures in books, and written on checks today, and the difficulty is that when that real wealth is produced there is no telling how the token or money claims upon it will be distributed. And frequently far too small an amount of such claims are in the hands of those who will promptly spend them or invest them. To turn his argument around I would like to ask: What is wrong when we have real wealth in the form of the abundant agricultural production available—real purchasing power, by his own definition—and yet the monetary buying power of our people is not sufficient to take care of it? Does such a situation not justify and require us to create sufficient token or money claims on this real wealth so as to enable buying consumers to use it, and deserving farmers to be rewarded for their labor? Believe me, Mr. Chairman, I agree most deeply with what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] said a little while ago: There is nothing more fundamental to the life of this Nation than the presence within it of a free and independent farm population. When that population, that independent family farm population, is threatened with destruction, or threatened with the loss of its independence, then, indeed, the Nation itself is threatened and there is not anything that this Congress should not be willing to do to prevent that.

CALIFORNIA'S PROBLEM

I agree with those who have said that many of the cuts in this bill are false economy, and I have a selfish reason for feeling this way. I come from California. I come from that State to which people go who find it impossible to make a living on the land as they used to make it.

I come from a State where hundreds of thousands of people have come looking for a new home, but unfortunately with the unemployment and other problems with which we are confronted ourselves, with a population of people over 60 years of age which is 12 percent greater than the national average, we find it difficult to carry this burden. We are, therefore, fundamentally interested in the welfare of the people of this whole Nation not only from the standpoint of being interested in the national welfare, but from the standpoint of being interested in the welfare of our own State and the problems that we face.

STAMP PLAN SHOULD BE EXPANDED

I believe with those who have spoken so earnestly here today for this stamp plan, that the Surplus Commodity Corporation has developed. I believe this is a program that offers real hope and that it should be extended, not curtailed. It is one way that has been devised whereby the hungry people of this Nation can actually use some of the food that has been produced by our farmers, and our farmers receive payment therefor. But I see no reason why it should be necessary to increase the public debt when that happens. Here is real wealth already created. Money is only a medium of exchange to transfer that wealth into the hands of someone who wants it. It has been proven again and again that basic farm commodities will respond quicker to an injection of additional money into the monetary stream of this country than any other commodities there are. Why, then, should we not in the interest of maintaining a stable purchasing power in the dollar that we depend upon to transact our business, in the interest of enabling these so-called surpluses to be consumed, why should we not in the interest of doing those things extend directly the credit of this Government in order to redeem those blue stamps that have been put out by purchasers? And let no one talk of unbalancing the Budget or increasing the public debt in this connection. I have just shown that neither is necessary and I would add that there lies in the Treasury today $1,500,000,000 of idle silver seigniorage to say nothing of the gold in Kentucky.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. PATRICK. Does the gentleman know upon what theory the use of these surplus commodity stamps has been curtailed? Can the gentleman tell me upon what theory their curtailment is supposed to relieve any of the distress?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I do not know. I presume it is an economy measure. I may say to the gentleman from Alabama that I do not understand the plan is to be abandoned, but I do understand that it is not to be used to that extent where it can be applied to new communities.

Mr. PATRICK. That is really the point I was driving at.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. As the Members of the House already know, it is my profound conviction that we can best find the democratic solution to the problems of unemployment and low farm income through constructive measures in the field of monetary reform and provision of a flow of consumer buying power comparable to our power to produce.

THE 12 FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS SHOULD BE PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS

I am ready to work in any way I can to that end. And I know no more logical first step than to put an end to the unconstitutional delegation to the Federal Reserve banks of the power to issue the Nation's money. The obvious way to do this is for us to provide for the purchase from the member banks of the Federal Reserve System of the stock of the 12 central banks which they now own.

I am delighted to note that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] addressed the House last Thursday and brought forcibly before the Congress the central importance of this matter. It is my earnest desire to cooperate with him and all others of like mind.

Therefore I have today introduced the simplest possible bill—a bill which provides but one thing—purchase by the Government of the capital stock of the 12 central Federal Reserve banks. I have simply lifted out of my comprehensive monetary reform bill, H. R. 4931, the section in that bill which contains this provision.

BANK OF ISSUE SHOULD ALWAYS BELONG TO THE PEOPLE

Now, this measure rests on two utterly unassailable principles of justice and good government. The first is that the function of original creation of money is a function of sovereignty and cannot be delegated away to any private agencies without violating the fundamental sovereignty of a nation. The second principle is economic. It is that it is of basic economic importance that whatever advantages derived from the original creation of any volume of the medium of exchange—whether by coinage or printing of money or by expansion of credit—should always accrue to the people generally and never to any privileged or selected group of them.

The ridiculousness of our present practice has never been more forcibly stated than by Christopher Hollis in his book, The Breakdown of Money, where he says:

Indeed the historian has to record that in almost every age there was some superstition or other of utter unreason which strangely occupied the minds of men, otherwise of activity and vigor. He has to confess that he cannot explain how it was that men once believed in the mystical significance of numbers or in the claims of astrology. We are sometimes ready to congratulate ourselves that our age has outgrown all superstitions. But the historian of the future will, I fancy, reckon in the same class as number worship and astrology and the study of the zizzards of birds the strange superstition that, whenever money is invented, a percentage must be paid forever afterward as a propitiation to a banker. It is on that superstition that the whole empire of Mammon is built.

RICARDO ON BANK OF ENGLAND

This is no new problem; nor are the two principles I gave above new principles. As long ago as 1824 the great economist, David Ricardo, left behind him at his death an unanswerable argument in favor of having the English Government instead of the private Bank of England issue the nation's money. In the course of Ricardo's argument he included the following paragraph, which has a strangely familiar ring to it:

If the view which I have taken of this subject be a correct one, it appears that the commerce of the country would not be in the least impeded by depriving the Bank of England of the power of issuing paper money, provided an amount of such money, equal to the bank circulation, was issued by government; and that the sole effect of depriving the bank of this privilege would be to transfer the profit which accrues from the interest of the money so issued from the bank to government.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

And Thomas Jefferson, founder of the Democratic Party of the United States, has left behind him the warning which we may well heed today:

If the American people ever allow private banks to control the issuance of their currency, first by inflation and then by deflation, the banks and corporations that will grow up around them will deprive the people of all their property until their children will wake up homeless on the continent their fathers conquered.

Today, however, the case for this move rests not alone on theoretical grounds or on those of principle, but on the facts of the present situation as well.

BUSINESS OF FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS TODAY

Ten years ago only 20 percent of the earning assets of the 12 Federal Reserve banks consisted of United States Government securities. Today 99.22 percent of their earning assets are United States Government securities. The detailed reasons for this change would take a long time to discuss. But the main fact is that the business of the Federal Reserve banks today consists practically entirely of the creation of credit (substitute for money) for the United States Government. When the Federal Reserve banks buy Government bonds they buy them with credit created for the purpose—with entries on their books. But the people of America pay interest on those bonds from that time on. This sovereign Nation has given to these privately owned banks the power to create its medium of exchange. But on the other hand the Treasury of the United States must raise by means of taxes the money to pay the interest on or to retire the bonds purchased with costless credit by these private banks. We are paying interest to the Federal Reserve banks for the use of the credit of the Nation itself, which is all on earth the Federal Reserve buys the bonds with. This situation is wrong and should be ended by the purchase by the Government of the stock of the 12 Federal Reserve banks from the present owners (the member banks). Then the bank of issue of America would be, as it should always have been, a bank belonging to the sovereign people of the Nation.

Our cash money consists mostly of Federal Reserve notes. They are issued by the Federal Reserve banks. It is required by law that these notes be backed by gold to the amount of 40 percent. As a matter of fact they are backed by gold to well over 100 percent today. On May 17, 1939, there were $4,750,545,000 of Federal Reserve notes outstanding. And the Reserve banks had $4,872,500,000 of gold set aside to "secure" them. But the "gold" really consists of "gold certificates in vault or due from the United States Treasury." By law the Secretary of the Treasury may redeem these certificates in "lawful money" (whatever that may mean under our strange monetary system of today) but never in gold. Hence it is plain that the Federal Reserve notes are nothing more nor less than Treasury notes. Yet the Treasury would have to pay interest if it borrowed any of them.

The original Federal Reserve Act, section 7, paragraph 1, provided that the Federal Reserve banks should pay a small rate of interest to the Government on all Federal Reserve notes issued. This was, no doubt, done because it was so plain that the money-creating power was being delegated by Congress to these banks. But by one method or another this requirement has been avoided, and no such interest has ever been paid. Again the original Federal Reserve Act, section 16, paragraph 4, required the payment of a franchise tax by the Federal Reserve banks to the Government in the form of the delivery to the Treasury of all surplus over and above the guaranteed 6-percent dividend on the stock. This provision was repealed in 1933, so that no franchise tax is now required. It was the hope in 1913 that the Federal Reserve System would prevent the growth of financial monopoly. Instead, about 75 giant financial houses control about half the assets of the entire banking system of 15,000 banks, and the squeezing out of small independent banks proceeds apace with the march of branch banking.

It was the hope originally that the Federal Reserve System would prevent booms and depressions. But the fact is that the worst and most disastrous depression in all American history took place with this system in operation, and was undoubtedly caused in part by the deliberate and cruel deflation carried out in 1920 by the orders of the Federal Reserve Board itself. And the present Board, by its own statements in its last annual report, says that it has no power adequate to prevent either disastrous inflation or deflation if certain forces favorable to either of these conditions should assert themselves. Should inflation of bank credit start to take place the Board has not the power either to raise reserve requirements or to engage in open-market operations to a sufficient extent to check it. Under the threat of inflation the Board ought to sell bonds so as to take money out of circulation. But if it did so, it would contribute to a collapse of the Government-bond market and the price of such bonds. So this power is ineffectual. In the face of deflation there is, according to the Board, nothing in the present Federal Reserve System that can effectively check it. Some may be inclined to question this until the Board vigorously uses its power of buying in Government bonds and thus replacing them with money. But it is largely true, I think, because we depend entirely for an expansion of our medium of exchange upon the creation of bank credit for the purpose of making loans at interest. And the very time when such loans are least likely to be made is a time of deflation, when the Nation most needs an expansion of its money supply. The present monetary system of our country stands condemned by the statements of its own defenders.

I do not think it is necessary to go on. The 12 central Federal Reserve banks now belong to the member banks of the System. The stock is worth a par value of about $132,000,000. But with the ownership of that stock goes the power of control over the monetary system of America. It would be a cheap price, indeed, to pay if for $132,000,000 we set America, her industry, her agriculture, her people, free from the control of her economic life by those who traffic in figures in books which we call bank credit, and who today have a monopoly of the privilege of writing those figures down in the books.

FUNDAMENTAL MONETARY PRINCIPLES

The bank of issue of America should be a Government bank belonging to the people and paying into circulation under the explicit direction of Congress such money or national credit as the national economy may require to maintain in our dollar a stable buying and debt-paying power in our domestic market. And such national money or credit must be placed in circulation debt free at the point of origin, which in every case must be the National Government.

If this Congress did nothing else but pass a bill making the 12 central Federal Reserve banks Government institutions, it would go down in history as one of the greatest Congresses of all time. This one measure will not solve all our problems, but it will put us in a position to attack them from a point of vantage that will give substantial hope of real and speedy success. The text of my own brief bill follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed forthwith to purchase the capital stock of the 12 Federal Reserve banks, and branches and agencies thereof, and to pay to the owners thereof the par value of such stock at the date of purchase.

(b) All member banks of the Federal Reserve System are hereby required and directed to deliver forthwith to the Treasurer of the United States, by the execution and delivery of such documents as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, all the stock of said Federal Reserve banks owned or controlled by them, together with all claims of any kind or nature in and to the capital assets of the said Federal Reserve banks, it being the intention of this act to vest in the Government of the United States the absolute, complete, and unconditional ownership of the said Federal Reserve banks.

[Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, I want to preface the few remarks I am going to make by saying just a word concerning the prices of several farm commodities down in southern Indiana in the year 1932. This is brought to my mind because of the prices mentioned a few minutes ago by the very splendid gentleman from New York. I recall in July 1932 visiting several flour mills in the Ninth Indiana District. The prices they were paying for wheat ranged from 32 cents to 36 cents per bushel. In October of that year, in Jackson County, fine corn, yellow and white, as fine corn as you ever saw, was bringing at the elevators 8 cents, 9 cents, and 10 cents per bushel, and fine hogs of proper weight ranging from 160 to 200 pounds each after being taken to the market at Indianapolis were bringing from $2.50 to $2.85 per hundredweight. I would like to have those prices compared with prices of today, even though prices are not today what they should be for farmers. There is some improvement nevertheless.

I call the attention of the Members to page 45 of the bill now being considered by the Committee, where for the Forest Service for the purchase of forest lands there is only $1,000,000 provided. For the year 1940 an amount of $3,000,000 was appropriated for this same purpose. I have brought to the attention of the Members of the House several times recently the fact there would be an attempt to reduce the amount this year to almost the vanishing point and when the bill was written and presented to the House today we find there is only $1,000,000 included for that purpose.

I notice that a number of items in this bill have been tremendously reduced. We believe in economy, of course, and we believe in a proper reduction of expenditures if it can be done without loss; but buying these forest lands is not a loss to the Government. We find that under the law enacted March 1, 1911, $4,250,000 was realized where timber was sold from forest lands that cost a total of under $60,000,000. In some of the States very little or no timber has been sold yet because the purchases started only recently. In my own State of Indiana only in the last few years has any land been purchased, so there has been no production yet from those lands. However, I find that last year almost $3,000,000 worth was sold off the national forests of the United States in timber alone.

Not only are there receipts from the sale of timber, but many other things of value are involved in purchasing forest land. Our forests hold moisture. They make preserves for birds and game. The forests hold moisture in the land and distribute it more equally throughout the year, so there is water in our streams constantly the year round, which will preserve the fish.

Further, forests provide many areas for sportsmen to enjoy. They build up the natural resources. Where forests are planted on eroded land, erosion is stopped, and thereby we reduce the crests of our floods and rebuild the land. It takes some time to rebuild these eroded lands. An inch of topsoil takes perhaps a hundred years to build, but after some years you do begin to get a crop of timber, and in 10 to 20 or 30 years you can bring back a new crop of timber.

In my own State they started purchasing the Hoosier Forest units several years ago and then for 2 or possibly 3 years there were no purchases made at all, so as a matter of fact in that 638,000-acre tract only 35,000 acres have been purchased by the Federal Government. This acreage is not integrated at any point but is scattered hither and yon because no one expected anything other than that the program would be continued.

I believe it is a good thing to have a liberal expenditure for national defense, but I do not want to see this Congress spend so much for national defense that it forgets the farmers of this Nation and the benefits to them. I do not want to see them spend so much for one arm of this Government that they will entirely forget the natural resources of this country. A nation which does not have timber and forest lands does not continue to be a prosperous nation for many years. It is only a short time until any nation that destroys all its timberlands goes into decay and is soon a weak and poor nation. Such nations destroy themselves when they destroy their timber and their natural resources.

When this bill is read for amendment I expect to offer an amendment to increase the item of $1,000,000 which is specified in this bill to at least $3,000,000, the same amount as last year. I believe the amount I asked in the bill I recently introduced, $15,000,000, for this purpose, is not out of place, but in view of the tremendous drive for economy at this time I shall offer an amendment to raise this amount from $1,000,000 to only $3,000,000. I hope to have the approval of the committee for this amendment, and I ask that the House back me up in it and increase the amount to at least $3,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MAHON] having assumed the chair, Mr. COLE of Maryland, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the Department of Agriculture Appropriation bill, 1941 (H. R. 8202), had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] in the extension of his remarks may be permitted to include certain statistics in tabular form on foreign-exchange rates.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the Record and include therein a short article from my hometown newspaper on the subject of the Finnish loan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made in Committee of the Whole today and include therein a letter from J. E. McDonald, commissioner of agriculture of the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made this afternoon and to include therein an article by Drew Pearson and Robert Allen, appearing in a St. Louis paper on Monday, November 6, 1939.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include certain excerpts and tables.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the extension of my own remarks which I made this afternoon I may include a brief table on the import of hides that go into the manufacture of shoes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein an address delivered before the Women's National Republican Club on January 20.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. D'ALESSANDRO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. D'ALESSANDRO. Mr. Speaker, I arise to call your attention to a resolution which I have just introduced.

That resolution calls for a thorough and sweeping investigation of conditions at the District of Columbia Home for the Aged and Infirm—popularly known as Blue Plains.

Several days ago Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt did this city a service by visiting that institution. She reported she found conditions there to be "shocking."

It seems to me that in this Nation's Capital we should be able to provide a decent place for the last days of those unfortunates who have grown old here and find themselves without the means to keep themselves.

If this city had suffrage and the right to vote, like other American communities, these people might be able to solve their own problems. But as long as this Congress keeps to itself the right to run the affairs of Washington, it should see that they are run right.

The resolution I have introduced calls for an investigation which would be carried on by the House District Committee or the proper subcommittee thereof. It would not cost one cent of the taxpayers' money.

I trust it will receive your support. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] if it would be agreeable to him to continue debate tomorrow under the arrangement which we have followed today?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That will be quite agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when consideration of this bill is resumed tomorrow general debate may continue as today, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and one-half by myself.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman include in the request that we even up the time? I think we are about 20 or 30 minutes behind.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I include as a part of my request, Mr. Speaker, that the time continue as of today.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—will the gentleman from Missouri tell us whether he intends to read any part of the bill tomorrow?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We expect to continue debate until all who desire have had an opportunity to participate. Of course, when general debate is exhausted, we will read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

GENERAL PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all who have spoken on the bill today may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LELAND M. FORD (at the request of Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT), on account of illness.

To Mr. McANDREWS, indefinitely, on account of illness.

6317. Also, petition of the City Commission of the City of Wakefield, Mich., favoring the approval of snow-removal projects by the Work Projects Administration; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6318. Also, petition of the Descendants of the American Revolution, opposing the continuance of the Dies committee; to the Committee on Rules.

6319. By Mr. HOUSTON: Petition of 46 grocers of Wichita, Kans., urging enactment of House bill 1, the Patman chain-store tax bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6320. By Mr. KEOGH: Petition of the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, Inc., concerning the wool-labeling bill (H. R. 944); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

6321. Also, petition of the Atlantic States Shippers Advisory Board, New York City, concerning Senate Resolution 146; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

6322. Also, petition of the Vessel Owners and Captains' Association, Philadelphia, Pa., concerning Senate bill 2009 or House bill known as the Lea bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

6323. By Mr. PATMAN: Petition of R. P. Craton, of Fresno, Calif., and over 3,000 merchants of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Utah, and Arizona, favoring the passage of House bill 1, the Federal chain-store tax bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6324. By Mr. SECCOMBE: Petition of the Quimby's Holsum Bakery, of Uhrichsville, Ohio, bearing approximately 75 signatures, protesting against the levying of excise or any other form of processing taxes on bread and other everyday indispensable necessities of life; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

6325. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Local 42, United Office and Professional Workers of America, Congress of Industrial Organizations, Milwaukee, Wis., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to antialien bills; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

6326. Also, petition of the United Federal Workers of America, Local 10, Washington, D. C., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to the antilynching bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, we come to Thee with our burdens, with our problems, and with our clamorous necessities and pray for Thy directive help. Do Thou interpret them for us and make them very simple in our outlook upon life. If aught in our hearts be displeasing to Thee, we ask Thee to remove it. Let us realize that the Christ is in our midst ready to speak to us His message; as we listen may we detect the accent of our Saviour. Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful; but his delight is in the law of the Lord, and in His law doth he meditate day and night. The ungodly are not so, but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away. Dear Lord God, enrich these passing hours; discipline us for everything that is intended to make us strong, brave, and true, and Thine shall be the glory. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE TREATIES

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman may proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] charged Secretary Hull's trade-agreement program with responsibility for an alleged outbreak of typhus fever in Tennessee and in other Southern States, allegedly caused by the importation of Argentine corn accompanied by rats.

The gentleman proceeded upon an erroneous premise in that no trade agreement has been made with Argentina and in that no health or sanitation regulation has been abrogated in any agreement with any country.

I have the following statement from the Department of State, which I quote:

First, the Government in its trade agreements has reserved the right to adopt any regulations it may see fit for the protection of human, animal, and plant health or life.

Second, the statement of Congressman CULKIN that the trade agreements "have tendered to foreign nations joint power over sanitary regulations" can be categorically denied.

I talked to Dr. Hugh S. Cummings, Director of the Pan American Bureau of Sanitation and former head of the Public Health Service, and he stated to me that in 1922, under his direction, one of his assistants, Dr. Maxey, conducted an investigation in the South, and at that early date, long before the inauguration of the reciprocal trade treaty program, typhus fever was found in Montgomery, Ala., and in isolated communities in Florida and Georgia. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Hon. William Allen White, enjoining the Republican Party to not fight the trade treaties now being negotiated by Hon. Cordell Hull.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include two short editorials from the Cincinnati Inquirer on the subject of the elimination of stream pollution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to quote the Excessive Expenditures Act, as well as to quote briefly from the hearings on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein a summary and report issued by the Federal Works Agency of the Work Projects Administration. I have been informed by the printer it will require three pages, at a cost of $135.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a brief statement which I made before the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short editorial appearing in the Indianapolis Star of Monday, January 29.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

W. P. A. FUNDS IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, today Pennsylvania raises her voice to cry out against a wrong that has enveloped thousands of Pennsylvanians in misery and distress from the Delaware River to the Ohio State line. Beginning today Pennsylvania will call to your attention from time to time the fact that by some cruel circumstance our State is not receiving her fair share of W. P. A. funds, and this afternoon, after the special orders of the day, my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] will present the first of a series of data that we believe will prove the discrimination against the ill-fed, ill-housed, and ill-clad of our State. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] will be followed by other Pennsylvanians who are determined that something must be done.

For months the controversy has raged between Gov. Arthur H. James, of Pennsylvania, and the National and State administrators of W. P. A. Governor James has charged the basest discrimination, terming it either accidental or political. Denials of every sort have been made by both Colonel Harrington, national head of the W. P. A., and Colonel Mathews, State head.

We Representatives from Pennsylvania have gathered all of the available material, statistics, figures, and allotments and comparisons and we shall day by day unravel this unhappy circumstance that the Congress may judge which is right.

We from Pennsylvania can testify absolutely to this fact that there are 100,000 forgotten men in the State that furnishes more than 10 percent of the income of the United States of America, and that they and their families are now addressing the Congress as a last hope for the bare necessities of life.

We have examined the figures prepared by the State authorities in Harrisburg and are prepared to agree with Governor James that the discrimination is evident and obvious, and that each day the wrangle goes on the sufferings in Pennsylvania increase. The sudden fluctuation of W. P. A. rolls in Pennsylvania is highly suspicious as the tide has been greatest as the elections neared and slightest after they were over.

We are loath to make the charge that politics enters into the amount of funds that are made available to Pennsylvania because some of the most stalwart defenders of the present administration represent our State in both Houses of the Congress. We Members of this House and of the other body who are determined that justice must prevail for our State have invited all Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to participate in our actions, thus proving beyond all peradventure of a doubt that politics is not involved in this plea.

We are assembling figures and information from the national offices of W. P. A., which we shall also lay before you.

Pennsylvania is the second largest State in the Union in population and wealth—first in industry and one of the first in mining. Pennsylvania is the birthplace of the Nation. In Pennsylvania was signed that great document that permitted us of Pennsylvania to bring this matter to the floor of the Congress. We trust you will bear with us in the succeeding days to come, when Pennsylvania stands at the bar and demands the justice that she as a great sovereign State is entitled to. [Applause.]

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, more than 2 years ago, in April 1937, the Supreme Court held that the National Labor Relations Act did not require an employer to enter into a written contract—a signed contract. On the 27th day of this month, last Saturday, the Labor Board held that it was an unfair labor practice for an employer to raise wages—not lower them—to raise the wages of men working in the plant until they had consulted the union representatives.

On the same day, notwithstanding the Supreme Court of the United States had held more than 2 years ago that under the N. L. R. A. an employer could not be required to enter into an agreement with the employees but need only bargain in good faith, and need not sign a written contract, the Labor Board on the 27th of January 1940 in the case of Wilson & Co. against United Packinghouse Workers L. I. U. No. 51, case No. R-1138, and Wilson & Co., Inc. against United Packinghouse Workers L. I. U. No. 51, case No. C-1149, among other things, ordered Wilson & Co., Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and its officers, agents, successors, and assigns to embody any understanding arrived at in a written signed contract. In effect, this order ignored a previous decision of the Supreme Court which held that after employer's and employee's representatives had, in good faith, bargained for a reasonable length of time, they need no longer continue negotiations, and in this case, the negotiations had extended from 1934 until in 1937, the board found that the failure to negotiate further was an unfair labor practice, and ordered a continuance of the negotiations.

The board also declared, as has been stated, that an increase in wages, without having first consulted the union officials, was an unfair labor practice and it then, to cap the climax, ordered the signing of a contract if an agreement was reached, although, the Supreme Court of the United States has held, as stated, that the act does not require the making of any contract at all.

Now, I am asking you the same question I have been asking all along: How long will we sit here and let this labor board, by its activities, wreck business institutions, increase unemployment, deprive employees of their pay checks, and do nothing about it?

AID FOR POLAND

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

LXXXVI—52

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, while young America was going through its birth pangs during the darkest days of the Revolution and it seemed very doubtful if even the masterful ability and sagacity of George Washington could bring the new Nation to birth, a brave group of the liberty-loving Polish fighting men under Generals Pulaski, Kosciuszko, and others, came to the aid of the discouraged and struggling under dogs, the colonial armies of the Thirteen Original Colonies.

Now, today, some 160 years later, we have the opportunity to repay our debt of gratitude and appreciation to those men, their nation, and their ancestors, and to express our sympathy for the under dog. They came to our aid in our greatest hour of need. Today millions in their nation are suffering with cold, with hunger, and are ill-clothed and destitute. Even the simplest of medical supplies and elemental nursing needs are inaccessible to them because of the ravages of war and the devastation following in its wake.

Yesterday in the House Foreign Affairs Committee hearing, I was privileged to learn first-hand details of the problems of the Polish people, to see uncensored pictures of the conditions there; to have my own private opinion confirmed, that their suffering is acute, their needs are great and imperative.

Several resolutions have been introduced calling for a congressional appropriation for funds to be turned over to the American Red Cross for the purchase of food, of clothing, and medical supplies.

It is my conclusion that action should be taken just as expeditiously as possible on these joint resolutions. I have among other letters, one from Senator Raymond J. Julkowski, a member of the Minnesota Legislature, in which he states that the 48,911 Polish people of that State are working energetically to raise funds for the relief of the sufferers and refugees of Poland, and asking every Member of the Congress from the State to support the Polish-aid resolutions. I am sure the Members from every other State will wish to join with us in this mission of mercy.

THE FORGED ATTACK ON THE DIES COMMITTEE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in view of the testimony taken by the Dies committee on yesterday, in which disclosure was made that one Mr. David Mayne forged and sold the letters which were used by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] in the speech he made on the floor of the House a few days ago attacking the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies], I am wondering whether the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] will not want to ask leave of the House to expunge his entire speech from the RECORD, to offer apologies to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies], to the House, and to the country. [Applause.]

THE LABOR BOARD A DETERRENT TO BUSINESS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I realize that we have a committee investigating the National Labor Relations Board. It is my hope that this committee will bring in a report in sufficient time that we may have legislation that will change some of the things that are happening today. Make the law give equal opportunity to management and labor. That is just and it is necessary.

If you want to put the 11,000,000 unemployed back to work the National Labor Relations Act must be changed. Let me read you a statement made by one of the leaders of the C. I. O. in my district who resigned from that organization. He states in a letter to me:

I believe the present set-up, whereby the Labor Board investigates, prosecutes, and judges, is insupportable and should be corrected by a limitation of power.

In another letter the same gentleman writes:

I sincerely feel that I have returned to common sense after a period of association with ignorance, apathy, and inutility.

When a man who belonged to the C. I. O. turns over a new page and gets out of an organization and then writes his Congressman that he is against it; and when the legislators here who enact such laws giving so much power to radical labor leaders realize that the people themselves know the law is wrong and unjust, we should change the law and prohibit these radical labor leaders from doing the things they are doing today in sewing up industry and prohibiting men from getting jobs. [Applause.]

ANNOUNCEMENT OF VOTE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, on Monday I was necessarily absent from the House. Had I been present on roll call No. 11 I would have voted "nay," on roll call No. 12, "nay," on roll call No. 13, "nay," and on roll call No. 14, "yea."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made in the committee yesterday and to include therein brief statements by the Chief of the Air Corps, high officials of the Army and Navy, and the Governor of Connecticut with reference to the death of Donald L. Brown.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address made by my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER] at the McKinley birthday banquet, Canton, Ohio, on Saturday, January 27.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECCOMBE]?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. BURCH (when the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I call up the bill (H. R. 2665) to provide increases in clerical allowances at certain offices of the third class, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BURCH]?

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask whether or not the minority members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads know of the chairman's intention to bring this matter up today?

Mr. BURCH. They do.

Mr. McDOWELL. The minority members agreed unanimously this morning to this proposition.

Mr. BURCH. This carries a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, is it the purpose of the chairman to give the House the opportunity to consider this matter and to lay before us what this will entail in the way of additional expenses?

Mr. BURCH. Yes; I will be very glad to do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BURCH]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after July 1, 1939, postmasters at offices of the third class shall be granted allowances for clerk hire as provided (39 U. S. C. 81), except the four higher grades, which shall be as follows: An allowance of $1,200 per annum where the salary of the postmaster is $2,000 per annum, an allowance of $1,500 per annum where the salary of the postmaster is $2,100 per annum, an allowance of $1,800 per annum where the salary of the postmaster is $2,200 per annum, an allowance of $2,000 per annum where the salary of the postmaster is $2,300 per annum: Provided, That the Postmaster General may increase the allowance for clerk hire at any office by an amount not exceeding 25 percent, where the needs of the service require, but in no case shall the allowance provided be reduced below the rate fixed.

Sec. 2. All laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 8, strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,320."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been amply and fully considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and the report brought in here is a unanimous report of the committee. This changes the clerical allowance for postmasters of the third class in the last four higher brackets. In other words, where the receipts of a post office are from $4,200 to $5,000, the allowance for clerical help under the present law is $1,050. This is increased to $1,200. Where the receipts are from $5,000 to $6,000, the amount allowed for clerical help is increased to $1,320; from $6,000 to $7,000, it is now $1,400, which is increased to $1,500; from $7,000 to $8,000 the increase is from $1,600 to $1,800.

May I say that the allowance for clerical hire for third-class postmasters is entirely inadequate. Especially in the higher brackets, the postmasters cannot conduct the business of their office with that clerical help. You will understand, of course, that this is not for one person or one clerk but for the entire clerical help of a third-class post office. In these higher brackets the postmaster very often has to employ two to three people.

Let me make a comparison. After you pass over $8,800, the post office goes into the second class, and immediately upon entering that class the second-class postmaster is entitled to two clerks at $1,700 each; so you can quite well appreciate that the third-class postmasters in these higher brackets are not adequately provided for.

May I say further that a representative of the Post Office Department, Mr. Ellis, appeared before the committee and favorably recommended the bill. Of course, the third-class postmasters are making a great demand for this legislation. I may say further that we reduced the amount provided in the original bill.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURCH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that at a time such as the present we should give some thought to what an authorization really provides. There are evidences of economy abroad today, and this has been reflected very definitely as the appropriation bills have come to us for consideration. The Appropriations Committee, however, is charged with the responsibility of providing the money to carry out the authorization, after the authorization bills come through. It seems to me that we ought to lock the stable door before the horse is stolen.

This bill will provide an avenue for additional clerk hire and result, I believe, in an additional cost to the Post Office Department in excess of $400,000. This means that the deficit of the Postmaster General will be bigger next year than it has been in years gone by. Before the Congress just carries along this program of approval, I believe we should stop, look, listen, and contemplate what we are going to do when the appropriation bill comes along that must carry out the obligation which we are entering into here today. I wonder whether the gentleman could not give us some evidence that this additional cost is going to be compensated for by additional revenue.

Mr. BURCH. It will be, absolutely; and I may say to the gentleman in that connection that the Post Office Department has in the last few years had to make use of a fund that is known as a separating fund for the postmasters. They have used this fund to a great extent to aid and assist these postmasters of the third class in connection with their clerical help.

With the increase provided in the present bill, an ample amount will be provided and the Appropriations Committee of either the House or Senate may make readjustments so as to take care of a great deal of the money provided in the separating fund, which is $410,000 for the present year.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia has made a very interesting observation. I know the type of arithmetic that is being carried on at the present time has a degree of intrigue about it as well as interest. Whether we take the money from this fund or from some other fund, in the final analysis it means that this bill leads toward a possible continuing deficit.

I wonder whether the gentleman cannot give us a further assurance, rather than simply saying that we will take money from one pot and put it into another pot, that these continuing and increasing deficits, in spite of the intrigue and machinations in bookkeeping, will be decreased rather than increased by the proposal the gentleman is now making.

Mr. BURCH. I do not know. I do not see how I as an individual Congressman could give the gentleman that assurance. I want to say to the gentleman, however, that he is not any more for economy in governmental expenses than I am. I believe if the gentleman will look at my record he will see that I have been consistently taking that attitude all along. Let me repeat to the gentleman that this is a case where the allowances for the persons concerned are absolutely inadequate, and it was so stated by Mr. Donaldson, by Mr. Dudley, and by Mr. Ellis; and Mr. Ellis appeared before our committee and said the present situation was shameful and that he was in favor of this bill. Of course, the Treasury-Post Office Department appropriation bill has just passed the House, and these changes can be taken care of by the Senate Appropriations Committee.

Mr. DITTER. By the same token, all others who are seeking aid from the Federal Treasury can say that they really merit such aid, and this probably would be the plea that would be made by all others.

Mr. BURCH. You should scrutinize every plea or request or demand that comes before you and see whether or not it is justified. I do not believe economy means that you shall not pay an official a reasonable wage or salary. In other words, I believe every question of this kind should be considered on its merits. Let me repeat that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has given this matter a thorough hearing and has brought in a unanimous report, agreed to by Members on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. DITTER. I close simply with this repetition of the cautionary word I tried to express earlier, that authorization bills are easily passed but ultimately authorizations must be paid for. Today we take the first step toward providing further funds from the Federal Treasury, which will only increase the deficits that so many of us at the present time are trying to avoid.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a very good time to show the country the House means business when it talks economy. We should start economizing with authorization bills, especially when they are opposed by the Budget. You will notice by the report that this authorization is not in accord with the financial program of the President, which means it has not been approved by the Bureau of the Budget. What are you doing when you pass this measure? You are simply authorizing an appropriation, and that means if the bill is finally approved before the Senate disposes of the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill, this item will be placed in that bill in the Senate. If the bill does not receive final approval by that time and there is an opportunity to amend a deficiency bill, you will find it added there. If you must wait until next year, then the Committee on Appropriations will include it in the regular appropriation bill or an amendment will be offered on the floor of the House and it will carry, as it will not be subject to a point of order.

It is the authorizations that run up your expenditures. This is going to be permanent legislation, and it will add at least $1,000,000 a year—not for 1 year but every year—to the expenses of the Government. I do not believe this is any time to be increasing the salaries of Government employees. I feel if they can keep what they have, they should be well satisfied.

As every one of you did, I received a letter the other day from the Federal Employees Association. They wanted to know if I approved the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations in not providing for promotions. I answered that I did. I told them that if we had to cut appropriations it was not consistent to add salary increases, even though many are deserving of advances by reason of length of service and their efficiency ratings.

Increases at a time when we have so many millions of people in the United States who have no income whatever is not sound business.

The Government employee has the best paymaster in the world. I receive letters, and so do you, from taxpayers asking me to find some taxpayers who receive the annual leave we grant to Government employees, or sick leave, together with pay such as we grant the employees. We have taken very good care of the Government employees, and I have helped to do it over a period of 10 or 12 years; but I say that now is the time to stop passing legislation which does not have the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, because if you continue this practice you are only increasing the deficit.

I want to go on record as opposing this measure, and I am going to continue to oppose legislation where it is sought to increase the deficit without the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget.

If I am not in error a bill similar to this was vetoed by the President. If so why put it in his lap again.

Mr. Speaker, as my record will disclose when we were in a position to grant increases to the Government employees I voted for the legislation. I felt they were entitled to it and then again I wanted to set an example to private business to increase the wages of their employees thus providing a better standard of living. I would do it again if there was a surplus and we were not running a deficit. The bill affecting your farmers, taxpayers who are served by the employees affected by this bill, has been cut several hundred millions of dollars which reduced their income. How will they like to see their appropriations cut and at the same time the salaries, of those whom they help to pay, increased? This bill and all other authorizations not approved by the Budget Director should be defeated.

Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks let me say I was called from the Chamber when the gentleman from Georgia asked if I would tell him how many Government employees in my district are affected by the bill. I will tell him now; I do not have the appointment of 1 postmaster, Presidential, first, second, third, or fourth class, but I do have 10 times as many postal employees living in my district as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Speaker, the authorization bills increasing salaries and changing the requirements of Post Office employees in the last 5 or 6 years have increased the cost of operating the Post Office Department $100,000,000 a year, as nearly as I can figure it. The additional cost this particular item will add is probably currently $500,000 a year, and ultimately probably will be at least $1,000,000 or $1,500,000. According to the Budget estimate, the appropriation required for next year for clerks in third-class post offices has increased $275,000 over that required for the current year.

I do not know what we are coming to. It seems to me this Congress should go slowly in adding continuously and everlastingly to the expenses of Government, and I hope that this effort of the Post Office Committee to add one more item of expense will not be approved.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the sincerity of some of our friends on this side in their efforts to balance the Budget, but I want to call your attention to the fact that we have clerks in these post offices who work for $30 a month. The sum total involved here is about $415,000 a year. Many of these men who work in these second- and third-class post offices work 10 and even 14 hours a day as indicated by the report and they do not get the benefit of the 40-hour week accorded the men in the first-class post offices.

You cannot balance the Budget at the expense of the Postal Service. One of the finest men who ever sat in this Congress on your side of the aisle, the late lamented Clyde Kelley, time and time again rose on this floor to indicate that this Department of our Government was based upon service and efficiency and that it was not a money-making Department. We cannot pursue a penny-wise and pound-foolish philosophy when it has come to taking care of the Post Office Department. I was here in 1933, when the Congress, in a mad wave of economy, passed the so-called Economy Act. We slashed every Government employee 15 percent in an effort to balance the Budget. You were going to save $250,000,000 a year, as I recall the figures. That was a cruel piece of legislation. So cruel, in fact, that within 18 months you came back here and you wiped out every vestige of the Economy Act because the protests were so numerous in your districts throughout the country.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Was it not the fact that the President said he was going to do certain things and after the act was passed he did not do what he said he was going to do, and that is what bungled the thing all up?

Mr. SWEENEY. I am not concerned about the bungling of that thing up, I am concerned now about getting some relief for these underpaid men.

I cannot go along with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] but I am in accord with what he states about there being so much unemployment in the country. There are W. P. A. workers in my community making only $57 a month and I want to join in a movement at some other time that will raise that wage; but do not strike these men, some of whom are only getting $30 a month, a wage below the present W. P. A. scale. The amount is too insignificant to have any real effect on the entire Budget of the Government.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I yield to my colleague from Ohio.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Is it not a fact that the minority members of this committee are heartily in favor of this bill, and may I not also point out that in the hearings the fact was stated that some of the postmasters have to go down in their own pockets for $20 or $30 to pay some of this clerical hire?

Mr. SWEENEY. The gentleman is absolutely correct. The gentleman is a friend of the post-office employees, and what he says is based upon observation and study. You have a unanimous report from the committee, and I am sure the Members generally wish to go along with us.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TABER. How does the gentleman figure when the allowance for the lowest class of post offices at this time is $1,040 and the highest class runs up to as much as $1,600, that any of these people are getting as little as $30 a month? I wonder if the gentleman has heard of any of these third-class postmasters who were prepared to give up their jobs because of the low pay.

Mr. SWEENEY. Well, I am not concerned about giving up their jobs. This measure has no reference to postmaster's increases of salaries.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I yield to the distinguished majority floor leader.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think I have given evidence here that I want to go along with the committees and cut things, and I think in the general post office bill they could, in all probability, cut out $415,000; but there are a great many Members of this House who do not understand this small post-office business, because they do not have any of them in their districts. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio that it is a penny-wise and pound-foolish policy that would starve the employees of these third-class post offices, and when I think in connection with all the appropriations we are making of the hundreds of employees in these little offices who are terribly underpaid, I think the least we can do is to pass this bill.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I have not the floor.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. SWEENEY. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Has it not been a fact, so far as the Post Office Department as a whole is concerned, that they are probably as well paid as any branch of Federal employees, and is it not a fact that we increased the postage rate from 2 cents to 3 cents several years ago with the idea of increasing our revenues so that we could pay $100,000,000 on our national debt? However, the Post Office Department brought in bill after bill until they have used that $100,000,000 in increasing the salaries and the services of the Post Office Department, so you will never get rid of your 3-cent postage rate.

Mr. SWEENEY. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in what he says about some of the branches of the service that are pretty well paid and have grown considerably in security, but I am referring to the lower-paid clerks who put in longer hours than most of the clerks in first- and second-class offices. The record of the Postal Service demonstrates that every increase in salary and improvement in working conditions promotes efficiency in the most important branch of our Federal Government.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I do not happen to be a member of this committee and therefore I am not entirely familiar with the facts upon which the conclusions are based. But I want to state that in my humble judgment the Post Office Department is just as vital to the happiness, contentment, and prosperity of the people of this Nation as any other department of Government. In other words, I believe the economic life of the Nation could be paralyzed quicker by stopping the postal activities than by stopping the activities of any other one department. And I do not mean to reflect or in any way minimize their importance. I hold no brief for the Post Office Department or its activities, but I can see a distinction between payment to employees in the Department generally and employees working in the third-class post offices. My experience and my observation is that the facilities and opportunities in the third-class offices are not adequate and are entirely out of line with the facilities and opportunities in the higher-class offices.

I am glad to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] when he speaks of unemployment.

And my primary purpose in rising now is to serve notice that at a later time in this session I plan to ask the Congress to go on record to increase the employment of the people by inaugurating a program that will build some post offices for these third-class offices. And I want to know whether or not the gentleman from Missouri will go along with me on that program?

Mr. COCHRAN. I will answer the gentleman by saying I will assume the same attitude that I did when the gentleman offered the amendment before on the relief bill, by getting on my feet and making a speech in opposition to it.

Mr. HARE. That is right. That is exactly what the gentleman will do. But he gets up here today and says he is in favor of increasing the employment of the unemployed, but the first time a concrete, definite opportunity is presented to him, he crawfishes and says he will not do it. Now, I am going to offer this amendment at the proper time, and I am going to ask Congress to provide third-class offices with proper facilities.

There are many of them that contribute to the postal revenues to a very large extent, yet many of these third-class offices are required to work under conditions in some localities and in some instances that are almost criminal. Many of them are mere firetraps or mere shacks in which postmasters are required to conduct the business of the Government, whereas larger offices have every modern convenience conceivable. I am going to take the position that this great Government ought to take the army of unemployed and use them to construct buildings so that those who work in them will be able to do their jobs more efficiently and more competently and at the same time increase the revenues of the Government and reduce the enormous annual rental expense.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield for a question.

Mr. COCHRAN. I hope the gentleman, when he offers his amendment, will not offer it on the relief bill, where he would take from the W. P. A. worker the money that he wants to put into these post offices throughout the country. If the gentleman wants to try it, do so on the public-building appropriation, not at the expense of those on W. P. A.

Mr. HARE. Since the gentleman seems to be softening up a little, we will put it on any place we can, but it will be with the idea of increasing employment, as well as furnishing new buildings. If we cannot get it on one bill, we will try and get it on another.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. When you offer that increase, will you try to tell us what the average citizen in those communities receives, whether or not these postmasters whose salaries you propose to increase do not get more than the average wage earner in that community?

Mr. HARE. We are not increasing postmasters' salaries here. I am not in favor of that. We are increasing the allowance for clerk hire in third-class offices. I am speaking from personal observation. My district does not have large cities, but it has a large number of third-class post offices, and I know first-hand the difficulty they have in many places in handling and dispatching the mail efficiently. It is not for the purpose of increasing the salaries of postmasters but it is for the purpose of increasing the help they have in the offices. This past summer I observed a number of cases where they were working under conditions that made it impossible to give the public the efficient service the people are entitled to.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman was probably out vacationing on some lake. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARE. Unfortunately, my district does not have recreational and watering places like those found in the State of Michigan, the gentleman's home State, nor do I have the time and means to avail myself of these pleasures to the extent he does. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I have a larger proportion and number of this class of postmasters in Arizona than has the average Member of this House. I favor the pending measure in their interest and in the public interest.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. WHELCHER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything in this matter to cause alarm. All of this increase was authorized in the act of 1925, but there simply has not been sufficient money to carry out that law. I understand, and I have this from authentic sources, that there is an increase of $24,000,000 in the post-office receipts of 1939 over 1938.

In answer to the gentleman who made the point that these appropriations have been going up yearly, I would give him this information: For the fiscal year 1933 we had 10,024 third-class offices. The appropriation was $8,500,000. In the fiscal year 1940 we had 10,077 offices, or an increase of 53 in number. The appropriation was $7,725,000. In other words, it has been going down each year.

I would call the gentleman's attention to the report and to that part of Mr. Ellis' testimony where he said that some of these people were not getting the wage that a W. P. A. worker received. He said, as a matter of information, that in this instance we have some discretion, and he said that due to the fact that our appropriation is inadequate, we must borrow from Peter to pay Paul.

He says:

Under the circumstances we know an inequity is being done these folks in third-class offices.

I know of my own personal knowledge that many of these postmasters themselves pay for clerk hire; and I want to pause long enough to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this bill does not concern the postmasters in third-class offices but deals only with the clerks—nothing more; it does not create additional salaries for postmasters, but it takes care of these clerks who are being paid in many instances by the postmasters themselves. It is a meritorious bill and ought to be passed.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHELCHER. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does it cover carriers too?

Mr. WHELCHER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman must have misunderstood me, for I said that it covered clerks and clerks only at third-class offices.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I was just wondering. At the little office of Fargo there are 17 applicants for the job.

Mr. WHELCHER. The gentleman is talking about postmasters at fourth-class offices. I am talking about clerks and talking about clerks in third-class offices. I am not talking about fourth-class postmasterships.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am talking about the clerks.

Mr. WHELCHER. The gentleman is talking about rural carriers. This bill deals with clerks.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHELCHER. I yield.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Is it not a fact that some of these clerks receive a lower wage than provided under the Wage and Hour Act; that in fact they do not come within the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act or the Social Security Act either?

Mr. WHELCHER. I am under that impression.

Mr. SECCOMBE. That was brought out in the testimony; that was verified.

Mr. WHELCHER. The gentleman was there and doubtless knows it was verified.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHELCHER. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am very certain from statements made during this debate that all are not familiar with third-class post offices and the small compensation these clerks receive. Those of us who come from districts where there are many third-class offices realize the handicap under which these clerks have worked. They labor long hours for small pay. This bill is meritorious and should pass.

Mr. WHELCHER. I ask my friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], if he is here, how many third-class offices there are in his district and how many of his constituents are affected by this bill? I do not do this to "put him on the spot," but the fact is that probably he does not have a third-class office in his district and knows nothing about this problem.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHELCHER. I yield.

Mr. PACE. This bill covers only the upper four grades. What is the condition of the lower nine grades in the matter of clerk hire?

Mr. BURCH. They do not have so much work in the upper grades, and they get along very well.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to take up the time of the House for even a few minutes on this very meritorious bill; but having had the honor of serving on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for awhile, I simply wanted to bear testimony to the integrity of that great committee and to the care with which their bills are brought out, to the absolutely nonpartisan method of procedure which is both the tradition and practice in that committee. This report is unanimous. There are no politics in it. These experts upon our Postal Service "know their stuff."

This bill is supported by reason, by authority, and by the unanimous opinion and vote of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee. I believe that the debate here today has evidenced the abysmal ignorance of the gentlemen who criticize it when they talk about being out on a frolic at a lake somewhere and of the condition in the local post offices at those places. They are talking about fourth-class offices, which have nothing to do with this particular bill.

Let me say to the membership of this House that there is not a committee of this body that has brought in fewer bills than the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Whenever they do bring in a bill, you can bank on it that the bill has merit. Not only that, but in this instance this is no log-rolling bill; this is not a bill to raise salaries generally; it is a bill for this particular class of clerks in third-class offices in the higher brackets, where everyone who knows anything about the Postal Service knows they have been discriminated against and that this relief is seriously needed.

We should support the work of this intelligent, hard-working committee, the character of whose service is shown by experience and is spread on the record of this House. When they speak, they mean it. While they are just as anxious as anyone else to balance the Budget, they are not willing to do it at the expense of continuing discrimination against the group covered by this bill.

As the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WHELCHER] has told you, this is not new. They have been clamoring to remove this discrepancy and discrimination since 1925. I beg the membership of this House to go along with this great committee in its nonpartisan and unanimous report on this very meritorious measure. [Applause.] It is not extravagance to pay our honest debts.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last 10 words.

Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the committee that this is a meritorious bill. Surely in many instances third-class postmasters could use additional clerical help to good advantage. The real question which we must decide today, however, is not whether this bill is meritorious but whether its enactment is essential to the proper functioning of the Post Office Department at this time. To put it another way, Can we afford it? In short, the question is as to the tempo, that is, Is this the time and the place to authorize an additional expenditure of more than $400,000 by the Federal Government?

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] just told us that this matter has been before the Congress since 1925 and has never been given favorable consideration. In these circumstances I cannot understand the logic of those who would place this additional burden on our Treasury at this particular time. We must not forget that our Government will soon pass the authorized $45,000,000,000 debt limit and that our Government is spending practically $2 for every dollar it takes in. This means but one thing, and that is if this additional $400,000 is to be spent, then it must be borrowed and interest must be paid on the money. Just $400,000 more which the generations yet to come will be compelled to pay. Yet there are those who say, "Oh, it is such a small amount." Do you realize that a vote for this bill is a vote to instruct the Treasurer of the United States to go out and borrow this additional money to increase the compensation in these third-class offices? We all talk about economy, yet it seems to be very difficult to economize when some particular pet project is at stake. It is likewise difficult to vote against appropriations for postal employees in an election year. The President has well asked where we are going to make the cuts. To me the answer is simple. The Congress should not spend money for anything except absolute essentials to the functioning of the Government and the relief of its people. Of course, the easy way is to vote for every appropriation or authorization where any considerable number of constituents will benefit. By the same token it is politically difficult to vote against an appropriation advocated by any organized or active pressure group in one's congressional district. We are never going to balance the Budget, or even approach a balance, unless this Congress displays more courage than it has in the last few years. The executive branch will not do it.

Later in the day the House will proceed with the consideration of the annual agricultural appropriation bill. Now, there are many desirable things that might be included in that bill, yet the Appropriations Committee has cut the proposed appropriation by more than 20 percent. That is taking money away that was intended in some way to benefit agriculture. How can you justify yourselves in withholding unessential but desirable appropriations from agriculture when we all know that the farmers are generally operating at a loss, and at the same time—and on the same day—increase third-class postmasters' compensation by $400,000? It would be fine if we had the money to double the compensation, yet the third-class postmaster is lucky if he has the job today. These are the offices which largely serve the farmer, and what is the farmer who is about to lose his home going to say when he realizes that his Congressman voted additional taxes on him to increase the pay of his postmaster. Better think these things over.

Now, I have many third-class offices in my district. Undoubtedly some of them do not receive very large compensation for the work they do, yet if a vacancy occurs in one of these offices there is a mad scramble for the job. Most of them are among the best paid people in their respective communities. When the unemployed find jobs it will be time to increase this compensation.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] advises us that he contemplates offering an amendment authorizing the Federal Government to erect new post-office buildings for these third-class offices. That just indicates the length to which some of our Members would go. So far as my congressional district is concerned, if I were to propose that new post offices should be built for all third-class offices, and that the Government go in debt for the cost, I would be severely condemned. New buildings are nice things for communities, but they should not be built unless they are essential until we can afford to have these luxuries.

Stress has been laid in the debate on the income from these third-class offices. It was not mentioned, however, that when the income from the revenues of the office reaches a certain point, the office then automatically goes into second class and there is a difference in the compensation. The author of the bill, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WHELCHEL], has called attention to the fact that the revenues of the Post Office Department were greater in the last year than they were in the preceding year. Well, what has that to do with spending this $400,000? We are never going to balance the Budget if we find new uses for all additional revenue. At best, this new law would but benefit a few. Several years ago Congress increased letter postage from 2 to 3 cents. That was intended as an emergency or temporary measure. It is still a law, and there is no prospect of a reduction for a long, long time. If we want to encourage the use of the Postal Service and benefit the users, why not give consideration to going back to the 2-cent stamp? It cannot be done now, but let us work toward that end.

In conclusion, do not forget that this bill authorized an additional appropriation without providing the means for raising the money. The people are demanding tax reductions, not tax increases. They expect the Congress to pare all appropriations to the bone, to the end that we may get back on our feet financially, and when the Government is able to operate again on a sound financial basis, then will be the time to pass desirable, even though not essential, legislation of this character. I have always supported adequate compensation and reasonable working hours for postal employees, but I do not think they are doing their own cause any good by demanding this increase under present economic conditions. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last 11 words.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is brought here by the unanimous report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. There has been much said about economy. Speaking in justification of the minority members of the committee, no pain nor anguish is more unendurable than for a Republican to vote to increase the national debt. But we did not do that. This bill is brought in here to right a wrong. This bill is brought in here to pay good, honest Federal employees some sort of a decent salary. I would like to make the observation here that this Congress has done much in reference to wages and hours for all sorts of employees all over the United States. We get all hot and bothered about machinists, the mill workers, and other persons, but Uncle Sam has a lot of people working for him, cleaning the halls, washing the windows, and so forth, who do not make a decent living. That is the reason the minority members voted to bring this bill out for consideration.

Mr. JENSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDOWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. As a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and as a Member of the minority side, may I say in all honesty and sincerity that every member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee analyzed and deliberated for quite some time on this bill. We came to the conclusion that this class of Federal help had been greatly underpaid for many years. I know that those who have third-class post offices in their districts will know I am stating the truth when I say that these people put in long hours and hard work for the smallest pay any class of Federal employees receive.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McDOWELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman know that at the present time General Farley, the Postmaster General, has felt that these allowances were so big he is reducing them 10 percent under authority of the bill. He considers the present allowances so high that he and the Bureau of the Budget have reduced them 10 percent?

Mr. JENSEN. I cannot answer that.

Mr. TABER. Well, that is the fact.

Mr. JENSEN. I do know that the Republican Party is for economy. The Republican members of this committee, as well as some of the members of the majority side, are for economy, but this is one time when we felt we should right a wrong, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDOWELL] just stated.

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, I offer a committee amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. BURCH: Page 1, line 3, strike out "1939" and insert "1940."

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in favor of the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, I have been very much interested in the discussion that occurred this morning. As a Republican my heart throbs in unison with the eloquent pleas that have been made for economy; yet I smile to myself when I think that this bill, which involves approximately $400,000 of an increase is being fought so strenuously this morning and later on today or tomorrow another bill, involving several million dollars, will go through with a wave of the hand. While I believe in economy to the fullest extent, and join my party in that, yet there are three types of bills I will go a little bit further on than others. For instance, I will go further than my own judgment dictates perhaps in voting for Navy and Army appropriations for our country. I would rather spend a billion dollars for the maintenance of our Army and Navy at home for adequate defense than to spend even a half million dollars or several million dollars on a foreign war, or for sending our boys across the sea to fight a war not our own.

Also, I would rather spend a little more, perhaps, than my judgment would dictate, to serve the public through the great post-office system.

I favor this bill. I call your attention to the fact that in the third-class post offices a considerable range of ability is required; different, perhaps, than is required in the second-class post offices, where the work is specialized. The clerks employed in third-class post offices must have the ability to grasp quickly all phases of the postal laws and regulations, the classification of mails, accounting, the issuance of domestic and international money orders, which is difficult with the ever-changing rates of exchange; and the handling of postal savings, as they do practically a regular banking business; and in addition they must have the ability to meet the public in a courteous and an efficient manner.

I favor this bill, and I know the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has given careful study to it. I ask that the House approve the measure. [Applause.]

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COCHRAN) there were—ayes 91, noes 26.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call of the calendar.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman state at this time whether or not general debate on the Agricultural appropriation bill will run for the balance of the day?

Mr. RAYBURN. I was not here when the House adjourned yesterday, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] made a statement, which is in the RECORD, that I believe is a clear indication that general debate will run all day if any Member wishes to speak.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have no objection to dispensing with further proceedings under the call of the calendar if general debate is to continue through the day, but I believe, in fairness to many of the Members, that the reading of the bill should not start today.

Mr. RAYBURN. If I were asked about the procedure by those in charge of the bill, I would suggest that if general debate did not take all day they read only the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-three Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 15]

Allen, Pa.	Douglas	Johnson, Lyndon	Reece, Tenn.
Andrews	Dowell	Jones, Ohio	Rees, Kans.
Barton	Duncan	Keller	Robertson
Beam	Elliott	Kelly	Robinson, Utah

Crowther	Halleck	Mott	Taylor
Cummings	Healey	Mouton	Tibbott
Darrow	Hendricks	Murray	White, Idaho
Dies	Hook	Pittenger	Wolcott
Dondero	Jarrett	Plumley

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 347 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL FOR 1941

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1941.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, with Mr. COLE of Maryland in the chair.

The clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, in the RECORD of January 23 there appears a colloquy between the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] and myself. At that time I called the attention of the Members of the House to a speech which the gentleman from Michigan had placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of the preceding day, which was a Monday. I charged at that time that this speech was full of trickery, deceit, and innuendo, and I asked the gentleman from Michigan "who wrote that speech for him." He answered, "I wrote that speech." I was in hopes that the gentleman from Michigan would deny the authorship of the speech and the contents of it. I hated to think that the gentleman from Michigan would be guilty of writing the material that was contained in that speech, and yet I had very good information at the time I asked that question that his speech, except for the window dressing that had been put into it by the gentleman from Michigan, had been entirely written by a gentleman who was part of a conspiracy that since has been exposed, under oath, to the Dies committee by sworn testimony, the purpose of which conspiracy was to defame the character of the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, the chairman of the Dies committee. I am astonished and surprised that the gentleman from Michigan, who has on the floor of this House repeatedly denounced communism, who at one time denounced the unlawful sit-down strikes, and who has in his soul, I am sure, the very germ of Americanism, would be led by a group of conspirators to defame a brother colleague on the floor of this House.

I do not suppose there are very many of you people who have read that speech. I charged at the time of the colloquy with the gentleman from Michigan that there was not a lawyer in this House that could read that speech and accept the evidence which he claimed tended to incriminate the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] and connect him with Mr. Pelley and the Christian Front.

I had in my possession at that time information which I could not disclose, which led me to believe that the entire evidence which he submitted not only to this Congress but to the Rules Committee was a complete forgery from beginning to end and was a tissue of absolute falsehoods. The suspicion which I had on that day has now been completely verified by the testimony that was taken yesterday before the Dies committee, when the author of those letters, under oath, admitted that he, for a price of $100 and the promise of a job in the Department of Agriculture, had forged these letters out of his own fertile imagination.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. There was no promise of a job. This gentleman did not testify to that. He said somebody else said he would use his influence to get him a job.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, if you draw that distinction, I want to say to you gentlemen that I read that testimony very carefully this morning, and I can come to no other conclusion but that the author of these letters, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Texas, that the persons who sought his assistance in writing these forgeries not only promised him $100 but promised to get him a job in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman who is supposed to have promised him a job in the Department of Agriculture has no official status—

Mr. KEEFE. I did not say that the man who promised the job had any official status in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman did say that he was promised a job in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. KEEFE. Exactly, and that is exactly right.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know what this man said, but I do not think the gentleman should go so far as to say he was promised a job.

Mr. KEEFE. I am going to say that the man who succeeded in getting him to forge these letters did promise to get him a job in the Department of Agriculture, and that is what he testified to.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is perfectly all right.

Mr. KEEFE. Let me finish, with all due respect to the majority leader. I have not said that the gentleman who made that promise had the capacity to give him a job.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; and the statement I objected to, and I am sure the gentleman did not intend it, was the flat statement that he was promised a job in the Department of Agriculture, and I think if the gentleman will read his remarks he will understand that. I have no doubt that this gentleman that he was talking to would promise him anything.

Mr. KEEFE. I do not want to make the statement appear that anybody in authority in the Department of Agriculture had promised him a job. I think it was all part of a conspiracy and a plan, but unfortunately, the conspirators themselves were let down in this case because the man whom they thought had joined them in the conspiracy, to wit, this man, Mayne, testified that he was out to get this man Gardner Jackson and Weisberg, the contact man of Jackson, who offered him the hundred dollars and told him he would see to it that he got a job in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas make any distinction between a bribe of $100 and a job and a bribe of $100?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think there is any distinction to it at all; and if the gentleman had listened to my questions and understood them, he could not have had that impression.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The statement was that he bribed him. What difference does it make whether he gave him $100 and a job, or just $100?

Mr. RAYBURN. The man who gave him $100 is not connected with the Government.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield indefinitely out of this little time that I have. I think I have made my position clear as to what I intended to say.

Mr. RAYBURN. And I will say to the gentleman it is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. KEEFE. I am glad that it is.

Now, the situation is just this: We have this thing confronting us. I challenged this speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] the next day after it was put into the Record. I have his authority under his oath as a Member of this House that he wrote that speech. We have the further statement from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook], given to the Rules Committee and also given to this House in answer to an interrogation by myself, that the facts contained in that letter are authentic. He further stated that he had submitted the proof he had to the Department of Justice for their further action. I have endeavored diligently to ascertain what branch of the Department of Justice those letters have been submitted to, but up to date I have not been able to find any department where the gentleman stated he had submitted his proofs.

Now, the fact is he has assumed full and complete responsibility for the authorship of that statement. He has assumed full and complete responsibility for the authenticity for the statements contained in that speech. The proof now is that, except for a little window dressing which the gentleman from Michigan may have put into the speech, the speech was written by a fellow by the name of Weisberg, who prided himself upon the fact and patted himself upon the back that he had written the speech.

It also now develops under oath that that same speech had been offered to another Member of Congress, and the gentleman is sitting here now and knows that I am telling the truth, because he himself told me. That speech was offered to another Member of Congress with the request that he deliver the speech and thus become a party to the conspiracy, and it is to the everlasting credit of the gentleman to whom I refer that he refused to accept it, because he had sense enough not to be a party to any such dastardly conspiracy as that. He had sense enough, after even the most cursory examination of the so-called letters and photostatic copies, to discover that the man who wrote them endeavored to protect himself from a charge of forgery by misspelling Mr. Pelley's name in the alleged signatures.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. RABAUT. To whom was the speech offered?

Mr. KEEFE. The speech was offered, and it appears in the sworn testimony of Mr. Mayne, given before the Dies committee, to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. Coffey]. It will no doubt come out when that testimony is printed. That is the fact.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that the "big shot" in this conspiracy is none other than Gardner Jackson, who is the legislative lobbyist on the hill for Labor's Non-Partisan League, the political organization created and dominated by John L. Lewis?

Mr. KEEFE. I will say that the testimony very clearly shows a conspiracy between Gardner Jackson and his friend, this man by the name of Weisberg, and it is Weisberg who wrote the speech and it is Weisberg who offered the $100 and the promise of a job to this man Mayne if he would produce these letters which proved to be utter and complete forgeries and which were submitted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] as being absolutely authentic.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the integrity of this House is at stake because that statement went all over the country. The front pages of the newspapers emblazoned in bold type that here was proof, submitted in the form of documentary evidence by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook], that links the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] with the Christian Front and with the Pelley organization, a plain attempt to assassinate the character of the chairman of the Dies committee, and, by implication, to smear and besmirch every member of that committee. I think that this thing cannot go unchallenged. I believe, Mr. Chairman, knowing that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] is, after all, an American and a patriot, knowing that he really in his heart ought not knowingly be a party to any such conspiracy, now that the facts have become known and his own integrity has been attacked, that the thing for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] to do, instead of waiting for the Rules Committee to order this speech expunged from the Record, is to come before this House and ask to have it stricken from the Record himself, and to apologize to this House and to the country at large for playing into the hands of a bunch of cheap conspirators who have been working for a long time to try to kill and besmirch and smear the important work of the Dies committee and especially its chairman. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. Thorpe].

Mr. THORPE. Mr. Chairman, my interest in agriculture is as keen as my interest in State rights and the right of the people to regulate their own affairs free from Federal oppression and persecution. It is high time that the people inform their Representatives in Congress that this Government belongs to the people who have reserved certain rights to themselves to regulate affairs, not only within the States but in private business as well. The Members should realize that they have taken an obligation to preserve, to protect, and defend the rights of the people, and that they are expected to honor this obligation instead of following communistic planning experts in the executive and other departments. It is sickening indeed to sit in Congress and watch this destructive planning in operation. It is a willful and deliberate attempt to bring about complete disintegration and demoralization of the Nation and our business structure.

I do not know which is the greater evil, the Gold Reserve Act passed in 1934 or the Reorganization Act passed in 1939. Both of these acts are not only unconstitutional but are unquestionably destructive to national security and detrimental to public welfare. For Congress to turn such powers over to one, two, or three men is a plain example of congressional apathy, and this is particularly true when those upon whom these powers are bestowed lack reasonable ability.

Let us briefly review the past 27 years. Since 1913 we have been subjected to more and more planning. This planning brought us into the World War without the slightest desire on our part to be so engaged. The same planning left us in 1920 with a 38-percent inflation of currency, or with a dollar worth 62 cents. For the next 8 years, while the Treasury was under the management of Governor Strong, the dollar in 1926 attained the value of 100 cents in gold and 100 cents in purchasing power, which, of course, is a desirable and sound dollar. During this 8 years planning did not cease but was retarded to a great extent.

In 1928 the international financiers, or the international planners, began to prepare the foundation for that which we have today—dissension, hatreds, and a nearly bankrupt Nation. If you recall, it was during the 4 years from '28 to '33 that the various bank corporations were formed, and the question may be asked, for what purpose? Was it to aid the people in the outlying districts or communities? It was not. It was, instead, a deliberate preparation to concentrate the Nation's wealth in the larger cities in order to enforce poverty upon outlying communities. It was to allow the larger banks and brokerage houses to cover up unsound international transactions, uncollectible loans, and other wild-cat banking, which left us holding the bag after the World War. This merger of banks was brought about by stock transactions in which many losses were sustained by gullible buyers of this stock. It left some of our real bankers, who understood local conditions, bankrupt and displaced by men favorable to the corporations and banks which had been of great aid in the community under the new management indifferent to local interests. I shall not elaborate upon this at this time, but the point to bear in mind is that chain banks, next to Federal monopolies, are the most malicious and destructive concentration of power that we have ever had. Both are a retarding influence upon development, destructive to private industry, and will, if permitted to continue, destroy our Nation's earning power.

These bank chains or bank corporations were organized in the hope that Congress would enact the Gold Reserve Act, which was actually passed in 1934. Their hope was to secure to themselves the control of all the gold in the United States, and, in addition to that, control of our commodity currency and credit. The Gold Reserve Act is in itself a most contemptible and unconstitutional piece of legislation which has impoverished our people and left them at the mercy of international exploiters.

It is this side of the agricultural question that has never been considered in Congress, yet it is most important because money is the power that moves all merchandise. Before 1933 our money was secured by gold in the United States Treasury, and was, therefore, valued upon its gold security. To establish a normal dollar worth 100 cents in gold and 100 cents in purchasing value, it was only necessary to bring about a balance of money in circulation with the gold in the United States Treasury. This most desirable state of affairs is a thing of the past, for we are now conducting business on an inflated dollar, or what is ordinarily called a commodity or managed currency, devoid of all value except what such money may buy from day to day. Its purchasing power is based upon the ability of some committee in the Government to keep all prices at a reasonable purchasing level. It is this phase of the agricultural problem that I desire to discuss in these remarks.

Let us always bear in mind that planned production, planned restriction, and planned operation are tantamount to planned poverty. Sound business depends upon active competition, alertness, and the will to go ahead and continue to build, as our forefathers have done before us. It is nearly impossible for farmers or ranchers to borrow money from the new chain banks, for no credit is available for farm investments. What is needed is service of independent banks, State or National, to serve the community in which the money is made. Chain banks or bank corporations are only interested in the accumulation of their own wealth.

This experimental planning in agriculture is paid for by the farmer, for he has allowed the Department of Agriculture and other incompetents to farm for him. Many of these unfortunates now depend on Federal aid, which, of course, means Federal supervision of their farms.

It requires very little experience to realize that when the prices of sugar, cattle, beef, and, as a matter of fact, all farm products are controlled by importing the same farm products from foreign nations, our own farmers pay for their own destruction. It should be clear if I am a producer of sugar, for instance, and must compete with an imported product produced by cheaper labor and under much more favorable circumstances, it will, if nothing else, prevent me from obtaining a fair price for my product.

The point I want agriculture to bear in mind is this: The present trade pacts and trade agreements are very important to the present planners in the administration, for such importation is actually a club beating the profits of our farmers into the ground by cheaply priced importations. Should farm prices go up, we will hear, as we have in the past, that prices on certain commodities are too high. This is supposed to be a warning for price reduction. If the producers fail to comply with this warning, importations will be increased up to the point where our own people are driven out of the market by merchandise admitted practically duty-free.

This governmental stupidity goes a little further than that, for we loan money to foreign countries to engage in competition with our own farmers, as we have done in many countries and so we did when we extended credit to Brazil for $120,000,000. The queer part of these transactions may be found in this glaring fact, that the Federal Government borrows this money on the credit of the United States, on the credit of our own farmers, if you please, who must aid in the repayment of the principal and the interest. Is it any wonder that our agricultural structure, as well as all other business structures, are undergoing rapid dissolution? I do not think so. Our own people are even beginning to realize the destructiveness of the present planning, for I shall now quote from a letter which, in my opinion, is apropos:

JUNE 5, 1939.

HON. J. THORPELSON, M. C.,

United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DR. THORPELSON: Since I am writing you one letter, I want to give you an interesting incident which came to my attention recently. I went for a short vacation for several weeks to Seattle, and on the train I met a Japanese who appeared to me to be a very keen businessman, so I entered into conversation with him. As he sat across the aisle from me in the coach, I told him I would like to sit by him and ask him a lot of questions, because I was interested in Japan and the Japanese and in what they were doing.

One of the first statements was that the American people waste more than enough to care for Japan and its war. Another statement that interested me very greatly was the fact that he said there were no unemployed Japanese; that many of the Japanese young people came to this country to be educated in our schools and universities, to return to their own country and use our business methods for the development of a greater Japan; and he cited as an incident that practically all of the young Japanese now are being sent to Brazil. He said that in a short time Brazil will become Japanese, and Brazil will raise more and better cotton than our Southern States; that Japan will raise in Brazil more and better wheat than all of our wheat areas.

He said to me, "You are a funny people. You are subsidizing Brazil for the profit of the Japanese." I objected, and he said, "You call it making a loan to Brazil; we call it subsidizing Brazil, because we do not believe you will ever get it back, even the interest"; and he laughed and said, "It is all for Japan as subsidy for the Japanese in Brazil." He told me also that they were overrunning Mexico, even to our southern boundary over to the California coast. He said, "Soon we will not have to buy your oil; we will have Mexico oil. Our young men are going into Mexico as doctors, merchants, and lawyers, and soon Mexico will be filled with Japanese, and we will be able to get all of our oil from Mexico as we get wheat and cotton from Brazil."

To my amazement, in last week's Life there was an article of Brazil, and the picture showed Japanese working, and the heading of the article was "The Japanese Take Japan Into Brazil." It is the issue of Life that had the picture of Mrs. Roosevelt on the front page. It made me do a lot of thinking. As a result it has occurred to me why we should not be able to use part of our unemployed at least, under direction of those who are capable, to take United States into Brazil and follow our great industries there, and follow our subsidy even as well or better than Japan is doing—at our expense. This may not be worth a second thought, but it occurs to me as a possibility.

Sincerely,

J. L. SHERBURNE.

I shall ask my colleagues to read this letter very carefully. It shows business acumen and farsightedness on the part of Mr. Sherburne, two qualities which are necessary for those who are employed in the Federal Government. This gentleman stated in his letter the very issues which are in controversy today, and which have, more than anything else, brought about gradual obliteration of our large farming interests throughout the United States. Loans of money to other nations to develop their agriculture and restriction of our own agriculture can only be condemned, but importation of the same product after it has been developed by our money is, in my opinion, the height of folly, for it can only end in our becoming an importing nation.

As I look back over the past 40 years, I can see the tremendous trade we had in wheat, in cotton, in lard, in meats—as a matter of fact, in all farm production. Today, we are, because of fanatical planning, leaving our own farmers in misery and poverty by engaging in planned destruction of farming as well as other business.

How can this be corrected? It can only be corrected in one way, and that is by placing a protective duty on all articles that can be raised or manufactured within the United States and its territories. If we can reduce Federal operative cost to where it was 28 years ago, we can operate within profit even with little or no export trade. It is there we must begin now. We should abolish all trade pacts and trade treaties, place duties upon all competitive imports, and an export duty upon war material. This will act as a protection for our own people, and for the protection of innocent foreign peoples by making wars costly to those who engage in the destruction of lives. Both taxes will aid in defraying the expenses of our Government and in restoring the rights of business and agriculture to operate unmolested and free from foreign competition and stupid Federal planning.

What Congress and the Federal Government should bear in mind is that profits may be restored by drastic decrease in overhead, and by drastic reduction in the Federal operative cost. The surplus accruing from such economic operation should be used to reduce the national debt, for no government can operate with a steadily increasing national debt as we now have, and with a constantly increasing deficit.

The greatest aid which can be given to the farmer is to allow him to operate under reduced taxation on his knowledge, instead of under Federal dictation. It is the duty of Congress to provide outlets and markets for the farmer, as well as for other business, and it is that I propose Congress consider seriously at this time. Let us first restore the home markets to our own people. When we develop a surplus in our production, let us endeavor to establish foreign markets for such surplus, or uses for surplus production in the manufacture of useful commodities.

I believe in full protection, and I am not opposed to armament, but the greatest security a nation can enjoy is that which is established when all of our citizens work in a united effort, "One for all, and all for one," to bring about national security and prosperity similar to that which we have enjoyed in the past. This cannot be accomplished by dissension, intolerance, or group segregation as we have today. Those who cannot go along with the principles of this Republic as set forth in the Constitution should be eliminated from the United States because they are anti-American and will always, no matter what happens, be a hindrance and a disturbing factor in the unity of this Nation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I am going to speak directly to the pending bill before the Committee. I am astonished by the provisions of this bill—the fact is I am amazed when I read it—but, since there appears no minority report, I take it that in the main the committee has agreed on the bill. I say candidly, however, that, were I a member of the committee that brought this bill in, I would at least have filed a minority report.

This Capitol here is seething with talk of balancing the Budget; that is, balancing our expenditures with our income from taxes. I am not opposed to reduced governmental expenditures, but I am opposed to taking the savings all from one single group. We have increased war appropriations, especially for the Navy and naval equipment, over $1,000,000,000, but to meet this unnecessary and useless expense we are taking the appropriation away from the farmers of this country—the actual backbone of the Nation in time of peace and absolutely indispensable in time of war.

We could not move a wheel in time of war without the farmer. No navy or army can operate without food, yet the very food factories of the Nation are being destroyed before there is any war in sight. Stop and compare a moment the value of a $75,000,000 battleship that can be blown up in 10 seconds with 75,000,000 bushels of wheat to feed the Army, the Navy, and the people of the United States.

Members of Congress are reciting in chorus nowadays: "Balance the Budget and save the country." In order to do this a majority of Republicans and Democrats are voting to take these appropriations away from the farmers.

I call attention to the following as some of the major cuts in the bill: Parity payments have been omitted $225,000,000; the Commodity Credit Corporation has been cut $113,000,000; farm tenancy, $25,000,000; sugar, $47,000,000; eradication of tuberculosis and Bang's disease, $4,000,000; National Forest Service, $2,000,000; new lands for national forests, $2,000,000; soil conservation, $3,000,000. All these items taken together, with minor slashes, make a grand total of $666,000,000. Everyone knows that if these payments went out to the farmers, as they have a right to expect they will, the least we can do will be done for 38,000,000 people in this country.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from North Dakota that, while I would like to see the Federal Budget balanced, I am not willing to balance it on the distressed farmers of this country, and until we do something to raise farm prices back to their normal levels we are simply penalizing him unjustly when we cut down the appropriations for the benefits he has been getting for the last few years. If they will restore the farmers' purchasing power to 20-cent cotton and $2 wheat, I will help to balance the Budget, but I am not willing to balance it at the expense of the farmers of the country, while they are selling their crops below the cost of production.

Mr. BURDICK. There is a budget in this country that ought to be balanced, I say to the members of this Committee, and that is the budget of human welfare. When people have to go hungry, dress in rags, and sleep where they can, it seems to me it is of greater concern to relieve these conditions than it is to have both sides of the ledger meet in the bookkeeping system of this Government.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly on that point. We shall never restore prosperity in this country by hoarding the gold supply of the world and burying it in the ground and then borrowing money from the rich and giving it to the poor for the farmers to pay back throughout the future years with compound interest. If, however, we would take that gold and silver and remonetize it at a reasonable ratio, of say 16 to 1, and put it into circulation, or issue currency against it and put the currency into circulation, we could raise the farmers' prices back to their normal levels and restore prosperity. Then the Budget would balance itself.

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman is right.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I shall take only a moment to endorse what the gentleman just said, that to balance the budget of human needs is more important than to balance the Budget of the National Treasury. While I am anxious to have a balanced financial Budget, and that as soon as it is wisely possible, I fear we are about to make a terrible mistake in this measure by taking it out of farmers.

Mr. BURDICK. Everyone knows that even with these payments the farmers are getting far less than they are entitled to, but take those payments away and the total insecurity of the farmers will be complete, but those who shout "balance the Budget" will be appeased. They can take this $666,000,000 and build nine battleships and the country will be saved.

The slogan of balancing the Budget is the only issue candidates for the Presidency harp upon. They all shout, no matter to which party they belong, "Balance the Budget." I am sorry to see such stupidity emanating from those who would like to carry the Republican banner. There is a budget that should be balanced. It is not the Budget in dollars and cents in a bookkeeping transaction but it is the budget of human welfare. People who are hungry and in rags, sleeping where they can, and out of work through no fault of their own at least have the right to life. The general welfare of the people of this country means more than even figures on the sides of the national ledger.

We need to offer opportunities for people to work—that is our job here; we need to strengthen the national defense by putting our farmers in order to produce food. That is what should be balanced. But no, sir. This Congress will not listen to that philosophy. The very first stroke in attempting to balance the Budget in dollars and cents is to take away from the backbone of the Nation its power of resistance against the depression. The 38,000,000 producers of this country will be less able to take care of themselves and feed the Nation—including the Army and the Navy—in the event of war. The number of jobless will increase. The farmers, like Dante, will be driven as fugitives from their own cities, but when the work of desolation is completed the same cities will claim the bones of their exiled Dantes and commemorate their lives with edifices and temples. It will then be too late, and our experiment of a government of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness will exist only in the musty pages of a forgotten history.

Many who vote to deny these appropriations to the farmers will hide behind the Bureau of the Budget. The Bureau of the Budget recommended that these appropriations to the farmers be eliminated. There is absolutely no logic in this argument. If the Bureau of the Budget is to be blindly and submissively followed, why have a Congress at all? It would be a shorter cut to let the Bureau of the Budget do the appropriating as long as the Congress is hog-tied to what it recommends.

I hope we shall have a few Members of Congress who will stand up here and be counted. If we cannot defeat this plan to strip the farmers of their just appropriations, we can at least let Congress look at its own stupidity.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. BURDICK. I am not one-sided in this Congress on legislation. I have voted for bills that helped the cities; that have helped the East, the South, and the far West.

I am willing to contribute to the general welfare of this Nation, because one section cannot be poor without affecting every other section. Today, when we are confronted with having the farm class of America, 38,000,000 people, stripped of the only means, in my judgment, that will enable them to continue during the year 1941, we ask the same consideration from the men in Alabama and from the cities whom we have helped when matters concerning them were before this body. Our Nation's entire welfare is at stake in this bill. The East cannot sell if we of the West cannot buy. In the end the entire Nation is injured when you make it impossible for the farmer to survive. Put back these appropriations. Do not increase the relief clients—do not make this great Nation defenseless. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, before I speak on certain items in this bill, I want to let the members of the Committee of the Whole House relax, for a minute, while I read them a bit of official humor. I do this for a purpose, because it shows that mistakes can be made even with the best of intentions, and I think that even with the best of intentions some mistakes have been made in the bill that is before us.

The paragraph I wish to read is germane to this bill. It deals with agriculture. It is in the official Federal Register for yesterday, January 30. It gives the penalties for the ranchers in Jones County, S. Dak., if they plant cotton in excess of their quota.

Now, the gentlemen from the South who have been worried about cotton competition should take heart. My farmers will be penalized if they plant too much cotton. The gentlemen from the North who have worried about corn in the South can cease their worries. They may get cotton quotas, too.

Let me read from the official Federal Register, the official 1940 bulletin on the range conservation program for Jones County, S. Dak., section 4, paragraph C. It is headed:

EXCESS COTTON ACREAGE

C. Excess cotton acreage. Any person who knowingly plants cotton on his farm in 1940 on acreage in excess of the cotton-acreage allotment established for the farm in 1940 shall not be eligible for any payment under the provisions of the 1940 Jones County, S. Dak., Range Conservation Program. Any person having an interest in the cotton crop on a farm on which cotton is planted in 1940 on acreage in excess of the cotton-acreage allotment for the farm for 1940 shall be presumed to have knowingly planted cotton on his farm on acreage in excess of such farm cotton-acreage allotment if notice of the farm allotment is mailed to him prior to the completion of the planting of cotton on the farm, unless the farmer establishes the fact that the excess acreage was planted to cotton due to his lack of knowledge of the number of acres in the tract(s) planted to cotton. Such notice, if mailed to the operator of the farm, shall be deemed to be notice to all persons sharing in the production of cotton on the farm in 1940.

When my western ranchers see that, I can safely promise you that none of them will exceed their cotton quota. Jones County, S. Dak., is in the very heart of the short-grass country west of the Missouri River, and the only native cotton that grows out there is that on the tail of a bunny rabbit or that which floats from a cottonwood tree in spring. The county seat of Jones County is named Murdo, Murdo McKenzie, for the great cattleman whose herds ranged there many years.

Some of you gentlemen from the South who are worried about competition in cotton, I give you fair warning—look out for cotton from the cow country.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Since the weather map has been turned upside down, and the thermometer is below zero, and my part of the country, much of which is covered with 2 feet of snow, maybe that is not a bad provision.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Perhaps I should send word out to the boys in South Dakota to start planting cotton.

Mr. Chairman, this shows that accidents can happen. I think that accidents have happened and mistakes have been made in this agricultural appropriation bill. I have too much respect for the membership and the intelligence of the members of that committee to believe that in every instance they had full information before them when they acted.

DRY-LAND EXPERIMENT STATIONS

Let me direct your attention, first, to the item for dry-land experiment stations in the Bureau of Plant Industry. Last year, there was appropriated for these stations, $226,828. The bill before us proposes to cut that to a flat $100,000, a cut of 53 percent. It means wrecking a program that has been going on for 40 years. There are 24 items under the heading of this Bureau, with a total appropriation last year of $5,408,009. This total is to be cut to $4,878,249, a cut of $529,760; a cut of less than 8 percent for the items exclusive of the dry-land stations, but there a cut of 53 percent to account for one-fourth of all the cut made against the 24 items in the Bureau's activities.

Let me call your attention to some of the remaining items. You will find them on pages 20 and 21 of the report on the bill. The subcommittee proposes no cut for the $49,000 for Arlington Farm; no cut in $76,000 for work in botany; $500,000, a half-million dollars, for cereal crops and diseases; $400,000 for cotton and other fiber crops and diseases; $47,000 for drug and related plants; $77,000 for experimental greenhouse maintenance, which was no cut; $225,000 for fertilizer investigation, which was no cut, in spite of all the money that has been appropriated for fertilizer investigations by the T. V. A.; $265,000 for forest pathology, a quarter of a million dollars; $1,250,000, over a million dollars, for fruit and vegetable crops and diseases; $25,000 for genetics and biophysics; $125,000 for irrigation agriculture; $45,000 for mycology and disease survey, which was not cut; $54,000 for a national arboretum; $48,000 for nematology; $39,000 for soil microbiology investigations, which was not cut; $300,000 for sugar-plant investigations; and $140,000 for tobacco investigations.

Money for all these, but when it came to the item for dry-land agricultural experimental stations, the stations which serve the people in one-fifth of the total area of the United States, the subcommittee, for some reason or other, has cut the appropriation of $226,000 last year down to $100,000.

In a total reduction of $529,000 on 24 activities, $126,000 was taken out of dry-land stations alone.

I want you to know what that is going to mean.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. I called the Bureau of Dry Land Agriculture and they tell me if this is cut down to $100,000 it will close every dry-land agricultural station in the United States with the exception of two.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And it will reduce those two.

Mr. FERGUSON. And it will reduce those two.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. So that the Members may understand exactly what will happen, I want to give a list of the stations that will be wiped out. Under the appropriations proposed, there will be no funds for these dry-land stations and the buildings that the Federal Government owns at these various stations will be allowed to rot. These are the stations that will be absolutely discontinued under the recommendation of the subcommittee:

Havre, Mont.; Huntley, Mont.; Akron, Colo.; North Platte, Nebr.; Hays, Kans.; Dalhart, Tex.; Tucumcari, N. Mex.; Sheridan, Wyo.; Big Spring, Tex.; Lawton, Okla.; Newell, S. Dak.; Pendleton, Oreg.; Garden City, Kans.; Colby, Kans.; Archer, Wyo.; Dickinson, N. Dak.; and Moccasin, Mont.

There you are—17 stations in States scattered from Texas to Oregon, all through the West. Stations Federally owned, from 40 to 360 acres in size, stations with buildings, records, and equipment, and getting only from $3,000 to $9,000 annually out of this appropriation. I think the one in my State gets $4,075. All wiped out. The only two stations that will remain of these dry-land experiment stations in the entire western part of the United States will be the ones at Woodward, Okla., and Mandan, N. Dak., and both of those stations will have to take a substantial cut.

I doubt if any Member of the subcommittee actually realized the situation or had ever visited these stations and been familiar with their work. These are research stations that have been cooperating with the farmers in the various communities. Some of them have been in operation for over 40 years and they will be wiped off the map.

These are old-line research stations. They are stations which are appreciated by the farmers. The one I know best has an exhibit day every summer. Two thousand farmers come there for a field day to investigate the work that has been done in feeding and the experimental work that has been going on in crops. Last winter I got a picture showing 300 farmers there in midwinter on a day when it was 10° below zero to study the results of a lamb-feeding experiment.

These are the stations that furnish the information to the Farm Credit Administration on which they base their loan policy—telling them of the soil capacity of the land. These are the stations from which the Farm Security Administration can get information as to what crops have the best chance of success in the surrounding area. These are the stations from which the several agencies of government get concrete records as to rainfall and crop production. They are the ones that give advice to the farmers and to the agencies of the Government as to what crops should be avoided and what should be planted. Their work is constructive. They use very little money. They help the farmer to help himself.

The only suggestion I could get from any member of the subcommittee was, "Well, we are buying some land and taking it out of production. Why should we be maintaining dry-land experiment stations in that area of marginal land?"

I fear the committee has been seeing The Plains picture. Despair propaganda has registered too heavily. Why, bless you, not all the land in the western half of the United States is marginal land. In every one of these States there is some of the finest land and some of the finest people to be found in the country. They have not all gone. Only a small fraction, in fact. Our farmers are sustaining their communities. They have their churches and their homes. They are not going to move out. If you cut out these dry-land stations and tell these people you are not interested in them, they are not going to move out anyway, because they love the West. You are not going to drive them out by choking off these dry-land stations. And it is far better to put $4,000 into these stations and let them help these people make a living where they are than to try to drive them out and tell them you want them on the relief rolls. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. I do not want the gentleman to miss the point that the value of these stations lies in their accumulated knowledge, the knowledge accumulated from year to year. What they have done through a series of years will all be lost if these stations are now closed or are even closed for a year or two.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman is absolutely correct. These stations have built up weather records, they have built up production records, they have built up records to show what trees to plant, what wheat and grasses to grow, what shrubs to control erosion, and other services in an economy adapted to the country they serve. I cannot believe that the committee understood the situation. I believe that when this matter comes before us at the time the bill is considered under the 5-minute rule the committee will accept some adjustment of this matter. I certainly believe the House as a whole will support a move to put back in the bill what should be placed there to maintain these stations. It is a small amount. Certainly it would be a shameful thing for this Congress to penalize these stations and the whole West in this way.

There are other parts of the bill I should like to discuss and in my extension of remarks I shall refer to them. Just now I want to mention briefly two topics.

THE SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE

First, I want to say something about the Soil Conservation Service and the voluntary work that is being started by the farmers through soil conservation districts.

The charge is often made that the Government these days is regimenting agriculture; that the farmer can no longer control his own destiny or do anything to solve his own problems, and that independence is but a memory back on the farm. In one respect at least, I deny that this is true.

I am speaking of the work being done to conserve the Nation's soil and water resources, the work done by the agency known as the Soil Conservation Service. No one disputes the great need for conservation. Saving America's soil resources is one of the great jobs we have to undertake, whether we like it or not.

About 5 years ago we authorized the establishment of this Soil Conservation Service. We created it and told it to go ahead and do something about soil erosion, floods, silting, and so on. Well, in the 5 years this organization has done something. It is working in almost 900 different areas across the country on more than 200,000,000 acres. It is controlling erosion. But the way it is working is the important thing. Instead of walking onto a farmer's land and telling him that he will have to do thus and so, the farmer himself is enlisted to do the biggest part of the job himself. With a little bit of technical assistance, the farmer solves his own problem.

The Soil Conservation Service has encouraged the formation of soil-conservation districts. Let me tell you what they are. Some of you may be confused, thinking this is a part of the A. A. A. Soil-conservation districts are something new in American agriculture.

Under most State laws for soil conservation, any 25 farmers may petition a State soil conservation committee for the formation of a district. Then, through a process of public hearings, public referenda, and public elections, the farmers themselves decide whether they want to have such a district. If they vote "yes," the district is established. If they vote "no," that's the end of it.

If a district is formed, the farmers get together, go over common problems, develop a common program, and go to work. By organizing and going to work together, a long stride has been taken. We will never have a permanent solution to our agricultural problems until the farmers themselves play the major part in the solving.

One of the big problems is soil conservation. A farmer often needs a little technical help in laying out terrace lines, or in planning the correct crop rotations, or in building dams or drainage.

That is where the Soil Conservation Service comes in. The farmers of a district can turn to this Service and ask for this technical help. I do not know all about the S. C. S. districts. Nobody does. They are new. They have problems, of course.

But in a little more than 2 years, 221 soil-conservation districts have been voluntarily formed in 27 States. These districts cover more than 120,000,000 acres. The growth of this district idea has been phenomenal. No one had any idea it was going to spread so rapidly.

So far, I am advised, the Service is working actively with the farmers of 165 districts, at the request of the districts. More districts are being formed almost daily. More requests are coming in for this technical help from the Soil Conservation Service.

I am told that the present Budget estimate will not permit continuation of the present program, let alone meeting the ever-increasing requests for help that are coming in from newly organized districts. Before the present fiscal year is over, the service will be working with the farmers of about 235 soil-conservation districts. But the present Budget estimate for 1941 will permit cooperation with only about 190 districts.

On the basis of the present rate of district formation, there will be more than 420 districts requesting the assistance of the Soil Conservation Service in 1941.

If we are to provide this assistance to farmers and carry on the other phases of the Soil Conservation Service program we will have to make some changes in the bill before us.

The 1940 appropriation was $23,720,584 but the 1941 Budget estimate calls for only $20,090,750. According to the hearings, service for the districts that will be operating in 1941 would call for increasing the 1941 appropriation by $4,157,100 over the 1940 amount. Summarizing—

Appropriation for 1940, $23,720,584; Budget estimate for 1941, $20,090,750; needed for 1941, $27,977,684.

Surely, this matter deserves consideration when we reach that point in the bill.

SMALL WATER FACILITIES

And in the minute or two remaining I want to call your attention to the item of $500,000 for the water-facilities program approved by the Budget, but eliminated by the subcommittee. I understand some of the members of the subcommittee were very much in favor of continuing that program, but it was dropped because of the feeling, possibly, that this is a duplication of the work of the Bureau of Reclamation in the Department of the Interior.

Such a feeling arises from a misconception. The $500,000 for the water-facilities program is distinctly limited by legislation, as well as policy, to small projects. This money is used for drilling wells, building small stock-water dams, and doing other similar work on individual farms, which calls for a close relationship between the lending agency and the farmer. The Department of Agriculture has a financing and collecting agency in the Farm Security Administration and has the Soil Conservation Service to provide the technical service that is necessary for building a proper dam and doing things of that sort. The Bureau of Reclamation has not engaged in this individual farm work and does not have the facilities or the machinery for undertaking individual water-facility projects on individual farms.

This $500,000 is for that type of small project. I honestly believe it would be expensive if you tried to transfer that particular activity to the Bureau of Reclamation, which is engaged in large-scale public-works construction.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe the gentleman, as a member of the general Appropriations Committee, will agree with me in this observation: That the appropriation for carrying the stamp plan dealing with surplus commodities was not eliminated because of the plan itself; it was eliminated on a point of order because there was no authorization of law for the continuance of the item.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman is correct. That is my understanding also.

Mr. HOUSTON. At least, the fact that the plan was eliminated from the bill is no reflection on the plan itself.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As far as I understand, there was nothing that came up on that point. I may state further, as a member of the special joint committee that was created in the House and Senate during the special session at the instance of the Speaker, that when we attacked the problem of emergency drought and flood relief the Surplus Commodities Corporation was very helpful and was the one agency that could come in the pinch and offer surplus commodities to avoid actual suffering in emergency areas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have had between 50 and 60 Members of Congress in the last 24 hours speak to me about this appropriation item. They wanted to know if it could not be put back in the bill. Of course, it cannot be put back in the bill in the House. It might be put back in the Senate, and if it is put back in the Senate the House conferees later can bring the matter up for a vote in the House.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. May I ask whether the $500,000 for the water facilities was taken out of the bill?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. It was stricken out in the subcommittee.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I greatly regret its loss and hope it will be only temporary, because I think that provision is one of the most urgent needs of the West. Of course, there is a bill pending to authorize an appropriation for the Bureau of Reclamation to build out of the reclamation fund small projects, not to exceed $50,000. Much as I favor that, the authorization is not yet passed and the money has yet to be appropriated. You and I, coming as we do from the arid or semiarid West, recognize the great work of the Bureau of Reclamation.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; and nothing I have said here is intended to reflect on their work. They do a great job in construction and management of irrigation projects. It is simply a question of whether this matter of building small projects, stock water dams, and wells should be transferred from the Department of Agriculture, which has a representative in practically every county in the country, to the Bureau of Reclamation in the Department of the Interior, which has no such personnel organized for servicing scattered individual farms.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I favor both programs and hope that the enactment of the one will not interfere in the enactment of the other.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I sometimes wonder if most of our troubles do not arise from misunderstanding. I wonder sometimes, with the many things that are calling for the attention of the Members of the House, that they can get as well informed on subjects as they do. For this reason it is surprising that so many mistakes are avoided rather than that so many are made. But in the light of the history of this House, and especially the experience that I have had in it, it is surprising that on a measure as important as this, the Appropriations Committee, which I understand only took final action the last day on a bill that was only presented to them the day before, should see fit to cut out 51 percent of the total appropriations. I said yesterday 47 percent, but I find that when we take the appropriations and the reappropriations for this year and for the coming year, it is a 51-percent cut. I cannot help believing that the men who did that did it without going deeply into this problem.

Thirty-one percent of the American people live on the farm. We have a Budget of $8,000,000,000 or $9,000,000,000, and they cut this entire appropriation, for every phase of agricultural work, to $640,000,000, a very small percentage of the National Budget.

I am willing for agriculture to take its share of any reasonable cut, but this is an overwhelming thing, all out of proportion to the other reductions.

There are 200 different commodities in the farm production of America. This is a broad, big country. There are many phases of the farm problem, and when a committee undertakes to eliminate certain items in toto, I am wondering if they do not go beyond their province. When the House has authorized, by its solemn decision, a certain activity, I doubt whether the Appropriations Committee should take the responsibility of completely eliminating those items without action on the part of the House. I concede their right to vary the amount of the appropriations after investigation, but in these items they eliminate a number of them, and a number of tremendously important ones.

No man can solve the farm problem with a single bill. I suppose there are many people who think they have a solution before they go into it very thoroughly, because there are nearly 400 bills pending before the Committee on Agriculture. We have five subcommittees. But the problem is too varied and no single bill can do it.

The roots of this problem are in the tariff, which in varying degrees has been in operation more than 100 years. I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of that subject, but anyone who has studied the question knows that the application of the tariff is lopsided in its effect as between agriculture and industry, so recognized by the original founder of the tariff and recognized by the original leader of the opposition to the tariff. Through the processes of 100 years that lopsided condition has been developed until this country became unbalanced in its economy, making it necessary for some sort of action to be taken to bring back the balance between agriculture and industry, because if you destroy the market for the products of industry by destroying the purchasing power of a great segment of the country, you ultimately destroy industry itself. Paralysis cannot come in one part of the body without ultimately reaching the head and the heart.

I was not surprised on yesterday to hear some Members say that our efforts along the line of the farm problem solution had been a failure, but I was surprised to hear that statement from one who has always been a friend—and a fighting friend—of agriculture. I almost felt like saying et tu, Brute, when he wielded the dagger and drove it into the heart of agriculture. I can but believe that he was acceding to the wishes of the entire committee. In fact he stated as much later.

When a man says it has been a failure I ask him, if he has even a short memory, to go back to the time when we had 10-cent corn, 20-cent wheat, and 5-cent cotton; when they took judges out in Iowa and other parts of the great West and threatened to kill them, and when millions of blameless people were shuffling in bread lines, helpless, hungry, and despairing as a result of this continual overbalancing of the different interests of this country. When the cash income of the farmer got down to $4,358,000,000 and now in 1939 it is nearly $10,000,000,000, do you think that the legislative program that helped bring that change about is a failure? There are many things that this administration has done.

We established the Farm Credit Administration. In the first 4 years, beginning in 1933, we refinanced more farms in the United States than had been refinanced in the previous 16 years of the land bank history, and we refinanced them at the lowest farm rate of interest that ever prevailed in the United States, and the lowest that has ever prevailed in any great country in the world. Was that a failure?

We have the Agricultural Adjustment Act, under which provision is made for soil conservation and for the rebuilding of the soil of America, in which every man, woman, and child in this land is interested. Anyone can read the story of China, once the richest country in the world almost, where the hillsides were plowed up, the rocks were taken out, the trees chopped down. Then the rains descended and the floods came and beat upon those hillsides and washed the soil down into the valleys, which became overpopulated and overcultivated, and finally on into the streams. Read the story of how the women gather up the soil along those streams and carry it back to the hillsides in baskets on their heads and on their shoulders; and then talk about that being a failure.

Then we have the Tenant's Purchase Act. I am wondering—I would just like to know how many of the committee members really read the testimony before they took a vote on that? That is one of the most tremendous problems in the world, and one of the most important.

My friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts, said something about going back home. How can a man go back home when he has no home? In some of the States of the United States 70 percent of them do not have any home that they can call their own. It is less in other States, but 42 percent of the American farmers are homeless. Of course, there is merit to their complaint that we are not solving this problem the first year. I wish we could do it. I wish provision could have been made, but in the judgment of the House we were not ready for that and could not go that far. But if you had a child afflicted with pneumonia or some dread disease, because you could not get the best doctor in America, would you kick her out into the street and say "die," because you cannot get the best for her? Or would you say, that because you could not solve all the problems of charity or the problems of sickness—therefore I will wrap my cloak about myself and do nothing for my neighbor? I do not believe you will do it when you think of it.

Listen, my friends, if there is anything that is dangerous to this country, or that will threaten this country, it is not an attack from without. I have enough confidence in the integrity, the spirit and the character of the American people, and in their resources and their willingness to fight, if necessary, to have very little fear of an attack from without. But if we neglect the problems that arise in this, the richest country in the world, and allow the seeds of dissolution to be sown, then we are in grave danger.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Before the gentleman leaves that subject would he kindly refer to the evidence showing the manner in which these farm tenants are repaying their loans?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I will be happy to do that. I am glad the Speaker calls my attention to that.

Listen, my friends, we started on a modest scale, of necessity. Only about 7,000 loans have been made for the purchase of homes, because that was all the money we had. It has been distributed all over the Nation. Of that 7,000, less than 4 percent are delinquent in any payment whatever, and there have been sufficient overpayments to run the total payments up to 159 percent of the amount of payments that were due. It is an amazing story. I took occasion during the summer to visit in a number of different districts and to watch the operations, the wonderful operations of that bill. I was amazed at the almost evangelistic interest which the county committees, which select these tenants, showed in their work. They impressed on the tenants this fact: "We want you to make good in the interest of the other tenants of the community. With the funds we have we cannot take care of all of you, but we want the ones who are selected to bend their energies to making good, in the interest of the entire program."

You cannot solve a problem like this overnight. The country that has probably the highest percentage of home ownership of small farm homes is Denmark. They tackled their problem in 1873 and are still carrying on the program. They have practically 99 percent home ownership—a happy, well-ordered, home-owning, and home-loving people.

The distribution of wealth is very even over there, and they have that patriotic zeal that comes from home ownership and from having an anchor in the ground and a place where they can lay their affections and build their patriotic feelings. You never find a people like that going into communism, bolshevism, or any of the "isms" that tend to destroy the life of a nation. If we will make this a nation of home owners on family-sized farms and average-sized city homes we need not fear the infiltration of these "isms." These are the cancerous growths that spring up on the various phases of an economy, no matter how rich. These are the little foxes that eat the grapes on the vine of national security and which threaten the stability of this country.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Can the gentleman tell us how rapidly farm tenancy is increasing over and above the relief afforded by the program we appropriated for the last 2 years?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No one knows exactly, and all figures since 1930 are estimates. There was a very rapid increase up until 1930. Over several years of that period there was an increase of 40,000 per year. Actually there are no figures except the 1935 figures, which were not very thorough as to the growth since 1930. I am inclined to believe, however, that there has not been much of an increase since 1935, but that is purely a guess.

Mr. HOUSTON. How many claims are in default?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Of the 645 loans that were made the first year only 10 have ever been in default; and only 3 are now in default of the 645.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not a fact that most of the loans are going to the South because they have a heavier problem of farm tenancy? I know that in Kansas not much has been done to relieve farm tenancy.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is divided in two ways: On the basis of farm tenancy combined with farm population, about half and half. The larger part goes to the heaviest tenant section, but not in proportion to the tenancy. Tenancy is weighted 50 percent and farm population 50 percent. These funds go into every State of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. In my State of Kansas there are approximately 45 to 50 percent tenant farmers, of the whole farm population of the State.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have the figures somewhere for the various States. They have been put in the RECORD before. They vary from 6 or 8 percent to as high as 70 percent.

Mr. HOUSTON. It seems to me that in Kansas we are not making very fast progress with only 25 of these loans made in 105 counties; that is 1 for every 5 counties.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Let me state to the gentleman from Kansas that this is apportioned on the basis of funds available, and we have not had a great amount of funds. As I said before it is based on need and farm population, but its effects reach over the entire Nation. Now I would like to proceed, if I may.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one brief question to which the gentleman may answer yes or no?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the current census give us figures on the farm tenancy problem?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The current census will, and I hope we may have the advantage of those figures at as early a date as possible.

Let me tell the gentleman something else: We so fashioned this tenant bill that an individual who owns a farm can turn it over and let it be handled by these people. I have had a number of landowners intimate that they were going to do this. I am hoping that some of these great philanthropists when they see the deep and underlying nature of this problem will, instead of endowing institutions alone, see fit to grant some of their lands to this organization for the building of homes and the establishment of individual homes. I can think of nothing that would contribute more to the stabilization of the United States on the part of a wealthy man than for him to give a few thousand acres, well located, to be turned into homes for the homeless, even though turning it over and accepting a small return would amount to a sacrifice. We have provided in another bill which we hope this Congress will see fit to pass, ways of broadening the solution of this problem.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to see it administered to distribute the benefits more evenly than to one county in five.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is a real problem in many instances; but if with the small appropriation they went into all counties at once, the overhead cost might become prohibitive. But let me draw another analogy. A man has appendicitis and an operation is performed. The next day, when he is lingering between life and death begging for water which he cannot have, some unthinking person comes along and says: "That man is worse off now than he was before the operation. Why don't you get another doctor? Why don't you call in Dr. Quack? Why don't you call in the doctor who gave us 5-cent cotton, 10-cent corn, and 20-cent wheat?" I use him only in the abstract sense. I think he had a tremendously hard job to fill at a time when probably no man could succeed, and I am not offering this as a personal criticism but am just offering recorded facts of the conditions we faced.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I had not intended to get into the gentleman's speech until he got into the Hoover field. Now, I think I have a right to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman wants to get into that field, he has my permission.

Mr. GIFFORD. Has the gentleman added the amounts of the appropriations for the last several years and divided it by 7,000 to arrive at what the average cost has been?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The cost is limited by the terms of the act to not to exceed 5 percent for the entire overhead cost.

Mr. GIFFORD. My other question is this: What effect will this have on the home body politic? When you take care of one in a county, even selected by the board the gentleman speaks of, how many dissatisfied ones do you have left?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I went into that end with surprising results. I thought I would run into criticism. My friend from Missouri said he did. I went to 6 different places, where I made that specific inquiry. They had about 25 or 30 applications for each place that was available. They called those people in and went over the matter and talked with them. I took the opportunity to talk to some of those who were disappointed, but they did not complain in a single instance. They said they regretted the program was not broad enough so they could get in, and they hoped the other man would succeed and that we would be able to broaden it.

Denmark did not accomplish her wonderful record in 1 day, 1 year, or 10 years. She has been working on this for 75 years. Those other Scandinavian countries, Norway and Sweden, have had low interest rates for the financing of their farmers and for the purchase of homes for a long, long period of time. Read the musty pages of history and you will find the secret of a nation's greatness as well as the cause of a nation's fall. When they failed to look after their farmers, when they ceased to be a pastoral nation, they did not last long. No nation should ever become overindustrialized, and no nation that has become overindustrialized has remained truly great over a long period of years. When industry and agriculture work hand in hand the best results are accomplished. The interest of industry is wrapped up completely in the balanced interest of agriculture.

Mr. GIFFORD. One more question. I fear the gentleman's ability.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman does not have to do that.

Mr. GIFFORD. One family in a county per year. How many years will it take before we will get enough to bring about that situation to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Well, sir, we started with more money than Denmark started with in proportion to population. Of course, if we never expanded it would take a long time, but if we build or expand on the solid foundation of our experience we will succeed. I am not willing to admit that America cannot solve this vital problem.

We started the Federal road program with an initial appropriation of $25,000. We started the rural-mail delivery with $10,000, so I am informed. There must be a starting point. We should start wisely, but above all we should start. You go down to the Smithsonian Institution and look at the first automobile. You would not start from here to Alexandria in it. It does not have any lights, it does not have pneumatic tires, and it does not have a windshield. But did they kick it in the ditch? No. The genius of America kept on. They only built a few the first year. They then spread out. Go down there and look at the first electric light invented by Edison. It is a very crude affair. I understand he went all the way over to the Orient to get the strips from bamboo cane, not knowing anything about tungsten. It will make a little light, but not enough to read a platform of Republican promises by. But it does make a little light. Edison did not abandon it. The genius of America kept on until we have the great white ways of today. The other day I noticed that General Motors had manufactured 25,000,000 cars. If they had abandoned that car at first because they could not give everybody a ride, where would we be?

Mr. GIFFORD. That is a complete answer to my question, I presume.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I hope so. If the gentleman wants some pictures drawn we will get an artist to do it. I appreciate the gentleman and I appreciate his interest.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am afraid of the gentleman and his wonderful ability.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not take my time to flatter me. I appreciate his good will; I know I have his friendship. He is a mighty fine gentleman and I am glad to have his good will.

We have done some other things. There is rural electrification. In 1933 when this terrible condition existed, less than 10 percent of the farms of America had electricity or the benefits of that wonderful commodity. When made in quantity it is the cheapest commodity in all the world. Through simple financing of these various associations at a low rate of interest more than 25 percent of the American farmers have the benefit of that commodity. It is taking the drudgery out of the farm home. Do you call that a failure? Do you think that is not a step toward the solution of the farm problem? Do you not think that is a help toward clearing up the farm problem?

There is another thing here, the disposal of surpluses. That was provided by section 32, which we reported and which the House is responsible for. It originated in that section. It has worked in such a remarkable way through what they call the use of stamps that it is sought all over the country. We want to produce all that the market will absorb, both at home and abroad. We have made provision so that some of these funds can be used to lift the surplus glut in different parts of the country and distribute it in the cities. I cannot understand why anybody from the city would vote against that proposition so long as we have any relief or relief work bills, because the cities get about 75 percent of the advantage. It is one of those few things that serves a double purpose. It serves the farming communities and the city communities, and it saves the relief bills.

I am sorry the committee saw fit to throw this out. I understand it was done through a point of order. I am surprised anybody familiar with the provision would make a point of order against that great undertaking.

Then we have a provision for research into new uses and new markets for farm commodities. All successful industries carry on researches of that kind. We are building four great regional laboratories, one in the district represented by my very splendid friend, the very intelligent and very brilliant young man from Illinois. One of these laboratories was located in his district.

This is a nonpartisan measure. It always has been nonpartisan. We kid each other on the proposition, but, after all, the farm problem is the Nation's problem.

I am always interested in what my friend from Illinois has to say. He is such a wonderful talker he can talk the birds right out of a tree. I never have heard anyone more skilled in that respect. I have wondered many times how he could get so many facts, apparently thorough facts, but now he has used as an argument against this tenancy bill the South Dakota experience. I wish some Member from South Dakota would rise and tell us about that experiment. It was not a farm-tenancy program at all, as a matter of fact. Way back in the days of high land prices some of the banks wanted to unload their obligations, and they unloaded some of those obligations at a rate of interest up to 6 percent. You know the experience the Dakotas went through during that period, a rather unfortunate experience. I have not investigated it as thoroughly as I had hoped to, but I found many points that made it utterly out of parallel with this tenancy program.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I may say in justice to the banks and the people of South Dakota that it was not primarily a matter of unloading mortgages from the banks; rather, it was an attempt to secure lower interest rates for the farmers in South Dakota, which in part did succeed. However, we have an annual tax bill over the State exceeding $1,000,000 a year now to make up the losses under our rural-credit venture. At the same time, however, it should be said that while the rural-credit venture resulted in some disaster and there were a great many foreclosures, and the State of South Dakota now owns some 7,000 farms—

Mr. JONES of Texas. Was there any disappearance of funds?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Not primarily in connection with that program, but, rather, in the handling of bank guaranty funds, which, in turn, closed banks and produced a cycle of foreclosures.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Some of the stories I have read indicated that there was some mismanagement.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. There were some irregularities in rural-credit funds, but they were not a large part of the losses that the State now faces.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not undertake to say that there were, but I do undertake to say that that experience was gone over, and I have found it in the hearings when we had the original farm-tenant bill under consideration. Even if the experiment in South Dakota was carried on in the best of faith, as to which I have some doubt in the light of my brief reading, as much as I had the privilege of doing in the last 24 hours, I doubt whether it was altogether a pure farm-tenant proposition. Even if it were, however, it was started at a time—in 1920—when land prices were all out of reason, and the gentleman knows it could not have completely succeeded.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will permit, I may point out that, although South Dakota has been going through the wringer on that proposition, so have all the insurance companies and the banks and everyone else that had farm mortgages during that period.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. I may say for the benefit of the gentleman from South Dakota that I have been told it is a matter of record that the treasurer of the venture in South Dakota was short $235,000, and that is one of the reasons the program failed.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Of course, that was a minor amount compared with the $30,000,000 loss sustained.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Many of the banks, according to the records which were given to me, turned their obligations over to this organization. That experience may be one of those steps you have to go through in reaching an end, and I do not offer this in straight criticism, but the fact that a farm-tenancy program has succeeded elsewhere and is succeeding now makes the situation such that we cannot abandon the program entirely simply because there may have been a failure or a partial failure somewhere else. I am sure the gentleman from South Dakota would not want to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. In order to be perfectly fair, is it not true that the present Farm Tenant Act has succeeded and that the tenants have paid even in advance?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Chairman has already asked that question. The tenants have not only paid in advance, they have paid 159 percent of the amount due, and that is taking into account the entire number that have been refinanced.

I do not believe the development of 7,000 additional farm-home owners in America is a thing that should be "sneezed at," as we sometimes express it in the language of the street. I am rather proud to have that many more home owners in beautiful, family-sized country homes than we had when the program started. I do not apologize for it.

May I say also that we have pending before our committee now a measure providing for insured farm mortgages, in a plan very similar to Federal housing, which is working. This would greatly broaden this undertaking. I hope the House, in the light of the immensity of this project and its far-reaching, deep effect upon our national life and our national economy, will not break down the organization which has been built up and these county committees who have such a vital interest in the matter and who give so much of their time, practically without pay, to making it a success. I hope you will not dismantle this whole organization before we get fully started on the program.

We are now going ahead with the various parts of the program, and we are bettering the entire farm program. I believe we have the best program now we have ever had in this country. I know it is not perfect, but we are going to improve it. I hope that we may improve it as we go along, and I hope we will not turn back.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. My friend the gentleman from Montana, Hon. JAMES O'CONNOR, who has always taken a very fine interest in farm legislation, asked me to call attention to another historical matter that I have mentioned before. The most fundamental principle in American life is the principle of equality in the application of the laws of the country.

That was written in the Declaration of Independence before we had a Constitution. It was carried forward in the Constitution. When the tariff act was first sponsored by Alexander Hamilton, its patron saint, in 1791, on December 5, when he made his report on manufactures, he recognized, honest as he was—while I do not believe in his general philosophy, I do recognize his intellectual integrity—he recognized that the placing of a tariff act on the statute books would be to the disadvantage of the farmer. He discussed that matter and suggested that when the tariff should be put into effect the farmers should be paid bounties as an offset to the tariff.

Now, that is not a subsidy. I get out of humor every time I hear them talk about a subsidy in connection with this legislation, and before I read this statement I want to call your attention to these facts.

I asked the Tariff Commission to give me the amount of industrial production in America. It was sixty billion and some million dollars in 1939. I asked them how much of that is protected by the tariff. They said they could not give me the exact figures but most of it is; that there is some of it on the free list but the greater part, in fact, a large percentage, is protected by the tariff. I ask what the average rate of the tariff is on an ad valorem basis and they said thirty-six-and-a-fraction percent. If you will take that $60,000,000,000 and assume that 50 percent of it is protected, and take that thirty-six-and-a-fraction percent and say 40 percent of that is effective in the way of increased prices, you have increased prices on tariff-laden articles in this country amounting to nearly $10,000,000,000.

I am not talking about the wisdom or the unwisdom of it, but taking as an example the cotton farmer who, with his wife and sometimes his children, bends his back in the blazing August and September sun and picks that cotton, sells it in a free market, and assumes the burden of those tariff-laden articles which he must buy, and then include the other surplus farm commodities, you will find that it would take a good deal more than the $1,300,000,000 that we had in last year's bill, before complete restitution is made to the farmers for their added burdens under the tariff.

Here is what Alexander Hamilton said:

Bounties are sometimes not only the best but the only proper expedient for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. * * *

The true way to conciliate these two interests is to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material, the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty, by way of bounty, either upon the production of the material itself or upon its manufacture at home, or upon both. In this disposition of the thing the manufacturer commences his enterprise under every advantage which is attainable, as to quantity or price of the raw material; and the farmer, if the bounty is immediately to him, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with the foreign material.

The first tariff act was not passed that year. A few years later it was passed, but they forgot the second wing of the Hamiltonian philosophy and adopted just the first. Jefferson and his group assaulted it, but through the years the tariff increased, and, finally, the doctrine was announced in the early part of this century that if we are going to keep the tariff the surplus-producing farmers are entitled to an offset to the tariff as a matter of simple justice, and on that philosophy I will stand today, and I believe every man, whether he is a high-tariff man or a low-tariff man, should stand by that philosophy.

Upon the principle of equality among all its citizens, this country has grown from simple beginnings to a proud position of freedom and power. I hope it may remain in a balanced condition. I hope it may remain a true Nation of equal privileges under the law. I hope that whatever is done in the way of legislation may either apply to all of the people of the Nation or the complementary part may be carried forward so that we may remain one great, united Nation, with a united economy in the interest of all our citizens with fairness and justice to all. On that basis we can go forward with the triumphant tread of victors. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, the ranking member of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if I take even the 10 minutes, because I believe it is useless to take even that much time. I do want to make two or three definite statements. I agree with my chairman that the subsidies, that we have been paying to the farmers, have been a wonderful help in increasing their purchasing power and they also tend to bring their prices up toward parity. However, up to this good hour we have not gotten their prices above about 75 percent of parity.

What I want to call your attention to is the major problem confronting the agricultural interests of this country and the Congress, and that is the farmers cannot continue to own and operate their farms when they only receive 75 percent of parity; in other words, it is impossible to buy a $1 article with 75 cents.

I want to make this additional statement: While I have gone along with the program trying to make landowners out of tenants, and I expect to vote for this item as well as for an appropriation to pay parity payments, you cannot make landowners out of tenants until you stop the thing that is making tenants out of landlords. [Applause.] You have not done it. You are not going to do it until the farmers, as a class, are put on the same basis as these well-organized and well-financed groups of the country that have the country by the neck today. These groups have their State, regional, and national associations, whereby they talk over their problems, and where they thrash out their trade practices, rules, and regulations; wherein they are able to control their production, their distribution, and most of them fix the actual price down through their agents or distributors to the consumer. The consumer can take it or leave it. The farmers, my friends—and I am one of them—operate as individuals. Most of them do not have technical experience in marketing and distributing their products. In a great many instances he has not the financial nor business ability to market and distribute his product. He has no bargaining power as to price. There are thousands of middlemen operating between him and the consumer; many of them are real parasites, sapping the very lifeblood out of the producer and the consumer.

The gentleman referred awhile ago to the Scandinavian countries. It is true that over 90 percent of the people in those countries own their homes, their farms. Why? Because their Government is doing what our Government, with the cooperation of the States, should do, and that which we will have to do, if our farmers are to be successful, happy, and contented.

Their Government actually protects them from these monopolistic, price-fixing groups if they have any. They assist them and cooperate with them in a way that their marketing is done properly—their products, properly graded and distributed without all those middlemen, and at a price in line with prices they have to pay for that which they purchase. We had one of their citizens before our Committee on Forestry at our hearings at Portland. He said they were all happy and contented. Why are the Finns, today, putting up such a glorious fight? Because they have something to fight for—their natural resources, and they own their own homes. The great national resources of this country that should belong to the people, are in the hands of these selfish groups, and they are ruthlessly destroying these resources. In so doing it, they are bringing about increased tenancy and unemployment. This means poverty, misery, and communism.

I contend that it is useless for you to spend money to investigate communism unless you do the things in the interest of the unorganized farmers and consumers that I have been talking about; because you cannot stop that kind of thing with the conditions that are prevailing in the country today.

Let me call your attention to one farm product, and it is true with every one of them. I have beautiful sweetpotatoes in a curing house on my farm today, which my tenants labored hard and long hours to produce, and they are selling for 50 cents per bushel, while the consumers in the city of Washington and every other city are paying $2 and $2.50 per bushel. Why is that? It is because you have millions of parasites operating between the individual producer and the consumer, and they are well organized with their associations—State, national, and regional. They do the distributing, and they get theirs. If anything is left they give that to the farmer. They have their high-salaried men here in Washington lobbying around and, brother, I tell you, in my 19 years of experience, they get through what they want, and they keep down anything they do not want that may be in the interest of the consumer and the unorganized class of people about whom I am talking.

Now, what about the forest resources of this country? In the great Northwest, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, where they at one time had 7,000,000 acres of beautiful timber, with manufacturing plants and people employed; farmers and wage earners with incomes sufficient to make them happy; today there are less than 2,000,000 acres sparsely covered with timber; unemployment and poverty running rampant; farmers losing their lands as tax delinquents. What is the next move? When I was out in Oregon recently a local paper in a county took 52 pages to advertise tax-delinquent land. These lands belong to individuals who were unable to pay their obligations and taxes because of their incomes.

Now, what is happening in many of the States? The State of Oregon, being unable financially to make these lands into State forest areas, they turn these lands over to the Forest Service, and the State is deprived of the taxes. Then these States and counties proceed to increase the taxes on the man who is still holding on to his land, and eventually he goes the same route, becomes a tenant. Already these States, and especially the counties, are demanding a larger payment from the Federal Government to help pay the running expenses of county government.

During the last few years, about 40 pulp and paper mills have moved into the Southeast. They have been buying up millions of acres of fine timberland that is protected by Federal fire money. That is, what these groups want is larger appropriations for fire protection. They are not cutting their timber. It is growing into wealth, but they are ruthlessly destroying every acre of farm woodlots, and at a price that is nothing but highway robbery.

Now, what are the facts? Do you expect to make a landowner out of a farmer, or hope to have farmers continue to be landowners, when he is getting 50 and 75 cents for a cord of wood, standing, and they are making him cut a cord and a quarter as a cord? There seem to be several agents between the farmer and the pulp and paper mills; with salaried men coming out from these mills, all of them getting two or three times more than the farmer is getting for that which he produces. As one lady wrote me the other day, "They wanted me to cut my cord wood 5 feet long and pile it 6 feet high, and offered me 50 cents per cord"; and in the meantime, she stated, "And the Federal Government is begging farmers to put out pine trees on their farm lands." These Federal departments are interested in appropriations creating new bureaus and new employees. Every State and Federal agency that appeared before our committee wanted additional money and employees. They stated they needed these to advise and educate the people. My friends, we have been spending millions along this line for the past 50 years, yet farmers, thousands of them, annually are losing their farms.

We have got to break up monopolistic price fixing, or we will have to put farmers in the same position in marketing and fixing of their prices.

I am for these appropriations for farmers, but we have got to do something to actually solve the major problem. If you stop these appropriations today, you will place the unemployed and the farmers in the same position we found them back in 1933. I am hoping the Congress will not kid itself by a reckless spending of the taxpayers' money. In a great many instances it is just like throwing it into a rat hole. I hope instead that we will do the major thing that has got to be done. If we do not, we might just as well stop. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with a rather anomalous situation. The very gentleman who comes before us and tells us that the farmers cannot make a living under present conditions; that they must have parity payments; that they must have their surplus crops removed and the removal paid for, on the other hand tells us that we must go on with this farm tenancy program at a cost of approximately $6,000 or $7,000 each to set farmers up in business. He tells us further that these rehabilitated tenant farmers are so prosperous that they are able to make not only all their payments on the moneys advanced to them but a living in addition. When does the gentleman describe the farm situation as it exists today, I ask him? I ask him how at the same time he can take a position in favor of continuing the farm tenancy program and at the same time say that the plight of the farmers in this country generally is so bad that we must continue parity payments?

I appreciate that, due to the terrifically destructive policies that have been followed with reference to the Labor Board and the Wages and Hours Act, which have helped prevent the employment of our people, economic conditions have been such that the market for agricultural products has been very largely destroyed. We must face this situation squarely; we must not dodge around. Let me say to you—and I have the releases from the Department of Agriculture to prove what I am about to say—with reference to these parity payments for the 1939 crop, the parity payments were 1.6 cents a pound on cotton, 6 cents a bushel on corn, 11 cents a bushel on wheat. A little further along in the release it is stated that, including payments that were made on account of soil conservation to the farmers cooperating, they received a total of 3.6 cents per pound on cotton, 15 cents per bushel on corn, 28 cents per bushel on wheat. This year the amount carried for soil conservation is the same as it was in 1939, including the unexpended balance that was made available, and my understanding is that the announcement has been made to the farmers that a bounty will be paid to them under the 1940 act of 1.5 cents a pound on cotton, 10 cents a bushel on wheat, and 5 cents a bushel on corn. With the soil-conservation payments the same, these bounty payments will practically equal the payments that were made in 1939.

Facing this condition, we must consider the situation as it actually exists. The figures I am about to give you I took from market reports. A year ago the spot market on cotton was 8 cents, today it is practically 11. A year ago the spot market on wheat in Chicago was approximately 58 cents a bushel, today it is 98. A year ago the corn market was approximately 42 cents, today it is approximately 60. In New York the butter market was 26 cents a year ago, today it is 33. The egg market was 18½ a year ago, today it is 25½. The only items where there has been a substantial reduction are beef and poultry.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman's figures are so much out of line with the facts that I wonder if the gentleman would mind stating the source of his information? Spot cotton is not bringing 11 cents; it is bringing hardly 9. Corn is bringing not 60 cents, but not even the loan value of 57 cents. What is the source of the gentleman's information? We certainly have to challenge those figures.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman could get these figures out of the daily papers. For cotton I was referring to the New York market, and I believe my figures are correct. There might be a very small percentage of variation, perhaps one-tenth of a cent, or something like that, but that is all.

I am wondering how, with the picture I have presented, we can justify a vote for parity payments equal to the amount that was presented here a year ago.

How can we justify any action which is going to further wreck our economic structure? One of the reasons for the low price of agricultural products and one of the reasons for our unemployment is the terrific debt that we are piling up and the deficit that the Government is running. Every day that deficit goes on and is increased, prosperity is harder to attain. When we make an appropriation or make an attempt to create a situation that has no justification in fact, every move in that direction is a blow at the farmers of the United States. It is not only a blow at the farmers of the United States but it is a blow at the financial integrity of America and unless we take steps to put our house in order and balance the American Budget, we are going to bring down upon the farmers, along with the rest of the country, complete wreckage. I am not going to be a party to that situation. That is not helping the farmer. It is helping to ruin him. We must take a stand firmly against that kind of an operation.

I am going to discuss in the few moments I have available some of these farm tenancy operations. I have before me the hearings upon that subject and I refer to pages 940 to 950. You will notice that on page 940 they give an allotment to Ohio for these farm tenancy loans of $911,000. On page 947 they give the same figure and there they give 109 loans. On 944 they say they are going to make 26 loans in Ohio.

With reference to New York, they say on page 940 that they are going to allot New York in 1940 the sum of $311,000 and that they are going to make 53 loans. On page 944 they say that they are going to make 10 loans in New York. The whole thing is a jumble. Wherever I have seen the operations of this outfit, I have observed that they have gone into a community, they have picked out some favorite, bought a farm that was a headache to somebody else at a high price and have turned it over to somebody who did not know how to farm. Maybe that will help the farming situation, but it certainly is not a business proposition; and the people of this country are not going to get back on their feet until we get rid of that kind of an incubus on the Government.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. Is the gentleman speaking from his own knowledge when he says they picked out farmers promiscuously who know nothing about farming?

Mr. TABER. I told the gentleman I was speaking of my own knowledge and with reference to the cases that had come to my attention. The gentleman can very readily see that with only 10 projects in New York my personal experience is not too extensive. I do know that where they have done it within my purview it has not been anything I would do.

Mr. SOUTH. I will say to the gentleman that in his own county and in every other county they have a committee composed of the residents of that county who are high type, high-class farmers, and those gentlemen select these tenants.

Mr. TABER. Do they pay this committee?

Mr. SOUTH. Yes; they pay them $3 or $4 a day.

Mr. TABER. There are no projects in the county in which I live, although it is a very substantial agricultural county. There are a few in my district. The whole set-up is bad.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman inform the Members of the House the average amount of these loans? Will he give the average amount of each loan?

Mr. TABER. It is difficult to tell. If you figure it one way, it runs about $30,000. If you figure it another way, it will run $5,000 or $6,000, depending upon which figures and which of the tables this outfit furnishes you take.

Mr. SHORT. About what is the overhead cost or administrative expense?

Mr. TABER. I am not able to answer that.

Mr. SOUTH. May I interrupt to say that it does not exceed 5 percent, as the gentleman knows, for administration expenses. The average per farm is between $3,000 and $4,000. The hearings show that.

Mr. TABER. The average per farm, according to Dr. Alexander, was $5,000 to $6,000.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the average of these items, according to the 1940 allotment, would be $5,500, which is shown on page 947 of the hearings. In 1939 the average of these allotments would be approximately the same. In 1938 the allotments figure at about $4,200 or $4,300 on the average.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY. Does not the gentleman think that possibly one of the greatest draw-backs to this program is the fact you take a man who is a nonfarm owner, put him in a community and let him have money at 25 or 50 percent less than his neighbors are carrying their load, and is it not true that that will have a tendency to break down the whole agricultural credit set-up?

Mr. TABER. It is very apt to.

Mr. MURRAY. In other words, you kick one man off the farm because he cannot pay two or three thousand dollars, turn right around, take the hired man and give him a farm, paying $10,000 or $12,000 for it, spend a lot of money on buildings and more money on improvements than is necessary to buy the whole farm. If the thing were administered with a little common sense it would probably have some merit.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, may I say at the very outset that I am in full accord with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], so far as he goes, but he has not been going far enough. He has been traveling very slowly along the right road, but has not arrived at his destination. In fact, he has been creeping and crawling. I am in favor of protecting and making even one tenant a home owner, if I cannot protect all of them.

I feel the time has come for our friends on both sides of this aisle to remember that we have been altogether too conservative in dealing with agriculture; that we have deliberately, and I say that word knowingly, betrayed the farmers. We have made them promise after promise and we have fulfilled none of those promises. We began in 1924 when we kept cool with Coolidge, but he vetoed the McNary-Haugen bill. Then we went along with Mr. Hoover, when he promised to put agriculture on an equality with industry. Well, Mr. Hoover succeeded. He put both of them in the soup line.

Then along came this administration. Franklin D. and the Democratic platform of 1932 promised us cost of production plus a reasonable profit for our farm commodities, and promised that the farm indebtedness would be refinanced. Franklin D. was told over the long-distance telephone from Chicago that this meant the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, and it apparently was O. K. with him. But after the election was over the President unfortunately found a Mr. Wallace, and he made him Secretary of Agriculture. Just why he should take a renegade Republican and make him Secretary of Agriculture is more than I can understand, but agriculture is paying the penalty for that mistake.

I am sorry that when the President selected his Cabinet he did not see fit to make Mr. Wallace his Secretary of Labor and Mme. Perkins his Secretary of Agriculture, because Wallace seems to be more interested in seeing that the farmers feed the laboring people below cost of production than he is in seeing to it that the farmers get cost of production.

This farm problem, and I say this to my friends on both sides of the aisle, has been before the people and has been before Congress for many years. If we had done the sensible thing in the first place, then it would not have been necessary to do all these things that are now being criticized, in order to keep the farmers alive.

May I say to my Republican friends, that you will not ride to victory in 1940 by simply throwing meat axes at what little my Democratic friends are trying to do for agriculture. [Applause.] That is little enough, but merely to criticize is not enough. In place of criticizing so much, why do you not go up here to the Speaker's desk and sign petitions No. 5 and No. 6, that would give to the farmers cost of production and the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill? Then we would not need all the laws we now have and this program would not cost the Nation one penny, whereas you have spent millions and billions and have done nothing for the farmer or for the people of this Nation except give them make-believe legislation. You have made beggars and tramps out of the farmers of this Nation, and you have loaded upon their backs 100,000 tax eaters.

You were attempting to solve this agricultural problem long before I became a Member of Congress, and I have been a Member for over 7 years. During all these 7 years there has been a group of us on both sides of the aisle who have been striving to do something that would relieve you from all this other make-believe legislation, but unfortunately we could not get a majority to come with us. Once or twice we thought we were nearly there, but then Mr. Wallace got busy and threw dust into our eyes. He came along with so-called parity. What is parity? It is parrot talk and does not mean anything.

Then you have not been honest enough to say, "We will give the farmer 100 percent of parity." You say, "We will give him 75 percent of parity." Yet, parity is still 25 percent below cost of production, so if you would give the farmer 100 percent of parity he will still be short 25 percent of cost of production.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] is now willing, and the rest of us will join him, to give the farmer 100 percent of parity, not only on five or six agricultural products—that is insanity, that is making a guinea pig out of those 5 or 6 products—but on 50 of the products the farmer produces. When we get that parity the farmers will become educated enough so that even you, my conservative friends on both side of the aisle, will have to wake up and walk a little faster or they will leave you at home. You will have to give them cost of production.

The average relief case in my State has cost the Government $2,400. We would not have any relievers in my State if you had given the farmer cost of production and the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill. Yet, while these petitions are up at the Speaker's desk, Member after Member gets up here and criticizes the present farm legislation, but he offers nothing in place of it and refuses to do the obvious—that which he ought to do—sign petitions 5 and 6. I do not know what there is that keeps Members from doing the intelligent thing, the sane thing.

Surely the 435 Members of this Congress are sufficiently capable of solving the agricultural problem if they want to solve it. If they will forget all about the lobbyists on the outside and forget about the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue they will have no trouble in reaching a solution. We are here to write the Nation's laws and the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue has a right to see that they are enforced after we pass them. If the President is not satisfied with them as we pass them he has the right to veto them and tell the people of this Nation why he does so, but they should not be sand-bagged on the floor of the House by the bureaucracy at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

I am not so much concerned in whether the tenants who do get into the program or those who do not are satisfied. I am interested in knowing whether it is for the best interest of this Nation that we make the tenants again home owners, and it is more important still, as the gentleman from South Carolina said, that we prevent the home owners who still own their homes from becoming tenants. Under the present set-up we make about 40 tenants for every tenant we attempt to make a home owner.

Let us be intellectually honest with ourselves. Is there a Member of this House so dull and so stupid—and I know there is not—as to believe that any system can succeed unless we see to it that the farmer gets cost of production? Can a farmer continue when he does not get cost of production? Can a lawyer continue if he does not get cost of production? Can a school teacher continue to teach if she does not get as much for teaching as it costs her to live and dress decently while she is doing it? There is only one intelligent answer to these questions, and that is cost of production. I trust this Congress will give us cost of production and the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill long before we adjourn.

It is not necessary to take the Massingale cost-of-production bill, or the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, but, at least, give us something that will do the job and we will be with you 100 percent.

We are told that we will not get out of this depression. It is not a depression now; it is a recession. Do you know the difference between a depression and a recession? When they depress you, they push you down. When they recess you, they roll you back—you go backward. There is no difference between those two animals—they are the same thing. But we are told we are in it because we have been going into the red. The truth is we got into it when we thought we were going out of the red. There was no going into the red when this depression hit the Nation in 1929. That was not the reason then, and the reason today is not the deficit as much as it is a lack of intelligence at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue.

There is no use fooling around about it. I shall vote against this bill because it is a camouflage. It is a hypocritical pretense to do something for agriculture when it takes away what little the farmers have been getting. It does something to them. I shall vote against it unless it is amended and some of these appropriations are reinstated. I shall vote against it because it is a fraud upon, and a betrayal of, the farmers of this Nation.

Now, if you do not want to continue these appropriations, I have given you the remedy. Sign petitions 5 and 6. I have suggested to you that you cannot continue the farmer in business unless you give him cost of production. You cannot continue him in business unless you give him security—the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill—so that when he gets cost of production some insurance company cannot snatch his farm away from him before he gets on his feet.

In past appropriation bills we have appropriated, and we are going to now appropriate, billions—for what? For the Army and the Navy at the expense of the American farmer. Whom are we at war with?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from North Dakota 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LEMKE. We are spending billions on the Army and the Navy. For whom? There is no nation threatening us. Oh, we will have to build a few battleships, perhaps, for kings and queens, but I am not interested in that. We have plenty of kings and queens in our own land to take care of. Let them settle their own quarrels over there in Europe. I will repeat that I am not in favor of making the farmer the goat again for European insanity. I am not for a large Navy at the expense of agriculture. The farmers had to pay for the last war that we never had any business getting into. We got into it because we did not know the facts, but let us stay out of this one.

Let us set a splendid example of what we can do for the men and women of this great Nation. Let us restore the appropriations taken out of this bill, and then after that is done, I want my good friends from Texas to join me and we will put over the cost-of-production bill.

If you insist, we will agree and change the words "cost of production" to "parity" to satisfy the Secretary of Agriculture. But we will keep the rest of the bill. When that bill becomes a law you will not have to appropriate one dollar, and then the gentleman from New York will not have to come up here and tell you about deficits. There will be no deficit. We will pay them all off if he will help us get cost of production, because then agriculture will absorb at least 3,000,000 of the unemployed you are now taking care of in the cities and towns, and that in my State has cost you $2,400 for each case to date, and I think the other States are in about the same position.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield for a question.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman indicates that his bill will take care of the farm problem and extend munificent benefits to all of our American farmers and will not cost a penny. Where are you going to get the money if it is not going to cost anything, and what do you intend to do for the farmers without cost to the Government?

Mr. LEMKE. We intend to refinance farm mortgages under the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill at 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal. I have been informed by a great number of banks that if the bill passes they will be willing to take the bonds. Therefore the Federal indebtedness will not be increased but will be paid, and the farmers will pay their share. We intend to give them cost of production for that part consumed in the United States and we will make that a minimum price.

I am sorry if the gentleman has not read the Massingale bill, because in that measure we tell you how it is done. We also have had hearings, both in the House and Senate, but I have not the time to go into that further than to tell you that when the farmer gets cost of production for that part consumed in the United States he will need no further help.

Under section 10 of the cost of production bill we stop the importations from foreign countries. In the 7 years that I have been here we have sold the American farmer short $16,000,000,000. We have imported foreign agricultural products and substitutes to that amount. That is the domestic valuation. This would have been enough to have given $2,970 to every farm family in the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, I was impressed yesterday with the statement of my distinguished colleague from Missouri with reference to the bill now under consideration. I am heartily in accord with his views on this bill.

I was also impressed when we had the agricultural bill under consideration at the first session of this Congress to hear the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] make this significant statement:

Personally, I was anxious to center the spotlight on this question with the hope it would stimulate thinking upon the subject, and that we should come to a point some time where we would try to do something for the farmer except to have as our objective each session of Congress as piling up additional gifts and subsidies, because that is not helping him. We are not helping the farmer when we increase his indebtedness and make it easier for him to borrow. I hope that some place, somewhere, there will be a solution and that we shall be able to find it.

I think that we can all agree that agriculture has been helped but very little with all the tremendous amount of money that has been spent to improve its condition. There are many factors which enter into it, but the principal one was pointed out yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and other of my colleagues on the other side of the House. The great trouble, if we may follow this line of reasoning a little further, is that agriculture has been crucified to help industry. I agree with both these distinguished gentlemen that we have not found a solution of the farm problem.

I hope briefly to point out why this is true. If you will read the statement before the Ways and Means Committee recently made by the Secretary of State with reference to reciprocal-trade treaties, you will find that his principal defense of them is that we need foreign trade or an outlet for the goods manufactured in this country, but if you will examine the exports, you will find that most of these goods are of industry and not of agriculture.

I am not going to quote, except on a few items, how the farmer suffers as a result of this. In reviewing the monthly summary of foreign commerce of the United States issued by the Department of Commerce, I find that we exported from the United States for the first 11 months of 1939, 3,143 head of cattle and that there was imported into this country during this period 724,815 head; we exported 12,918,044 pounds of canned meats, and we imported canned beef alone of 82,511,852 pounds; we exported during this same 11 months 1,356,582 pounds of cheese, and we imported during the same period 55,592,510 pounds. During the first 11 months of 1939 we exported 435,774 pounds of hides and skins, raw, and we imported 31,360,143 pounds.

I could go on for an hour through the dairy products, but it is useless to bring to your attention more than the items that I just quoted. There is no use continuing to try to hand out money to the farmers in this country and to try to raise the price of what they are able to sell, or to try to furnish enough money to dispose of their surplus, unless they have some protection of some kind. This is not a partisan matter; it is only a question in my mind whether we are not thinking too much about industry in maintaining the higher living standards and forgetting entirely about those who labor and toil that you and I may live.

To my mind there is not much use in giving a farmer $10 or $20, or possibly a larger sum, depending entirely upon the acreage that he may be farming, if you give it to him just shortly before election and then take it away from him again in January, when he has to pay his taxes.

I make this statement because in 1938, the last year for which detailed data are available, expenditures of all governmental authorities aggregated sixteen and eight-tenths billions as contrasted with eleven and six-tenths billions in 1929. Of these totals, the Federal Government accounted for seven and five-tenths billions in 1938 and three billions in 1929; State and local governments spent nine and three-tenths billions in 1938 as contrasted with eight and seven-tenths billions in 1929.

The Federal Government now accounts for 45 percent of all governmental expenditures as contrasted with only 26 percent in 1929.

Per capita governmental expenditures rose from $95.54 in 1929 to $129.02 in 1938.

The per capita tax burden rose from $80.30 in 1929 to $107.51 in 1938.

I wish to call the Congress' attention to our present indebtedness which most of you are familiar with but perhaps have not figured it out as to just what it is costing us each day and the amount that we are borrowing. The public debt at the close of business on January 15, 1940, was $42,106,638,580.49. Our total expenditure from July 1, 1939, to January 16, 1940, a period of 6½ months of the present fiscal year, is $5,165,434,493.22. Total receipts for the same period are $2,902,832,615.58. Excess of expenditures over receipts for the period are $2,262,601,877.64. Our spending has been at the rate of $25,956,957.25 per day, and $1,081,539.88 each hour, or $18,025.66 each minute. We are running in the red at the rate of $14,587,098.57 each day, or $607,795.77 for every hour of the day. Our deficit last year was approximately three and a half billions. Our Budget has been out of balance now for over 10 years. Just what would your banker say if you had money borrowed from him and had been running behind for 10 years? If you do not know, just try him.

Notwithstanding this apparent failure on our part to help the farmer, I am deeply interested in any efforts that may be made to help him. My own farms are dairy farms, and naturally I am interested in anything that will help the dairy farmers, because in my own district and State we have more of them than any other State in the Union. The dairy interest has been very hard hit with declining prices in the past few years.

Having been born and raised on the farm, and having lived there until I was 20 years of age, and having owned and operated farms most of my life, I naturally am deeply interested in the problems of all farmers and in the problems of agriculture.

There are many millions of them and their families, and after all we can never have any real prosperity in this country unless the farmer is first prosperous.

This is a period in history when many people want something from the Government, because that is what is termed the "more abundant life." In these hand-outs the farmer has fared pretty well along with all other people. I think it might be well to put a few of these figures into the RECORD to show what has been received.

The Government has given to the Department of Agriculture during the past 8 years directly and indirectly about $15,000,000,000, and directly $7,337,000,000. You know the condition of agriculture today, and I will leave it to the judgment of my colleagues as to whether it has helped the farmer or agriculture very much or not. I have grave doubts about it myself.

I might say that the vast sums mentioned do not include losses that may result by reason of guaranties and other commitments that have been made by the Government.

Beginning back in 1848 the Federal Government appropriated $3,000 for agricultural purposes. This was gradually increased until 1860 when it reached $60,000. By 1881 it totaled $353,000. In 1888 it had reached $1,028,000. By 1901 it reached $4,023,000. Seven years later the amount reached $9,437,000.

During the next 9 years, or up until 1917, when we entered the World War, we had only increased this amount slightly, but on account of the demand for food stimulation, the amount appropriated that year reached $40,000,000, and dropped to $38,000,000 in 1918, but was back to $112,000,000 in 1920, besides a $1,000,000,000 wheat guaranty. In 1922 we appropriated $38,000,000, but we created the seed loans at that time by appropriating $1,500,000,000 for that purpose. In 1923 we gave agriculture $62,000,000 besides $25,000,000 for roads. In 1930 these appropriations had increased to $160,000,000. This same year $251,000,000 was appropriated for marketing funds. It was at this time that we began to increase the appropriations for agriculture with the thought in mind, of course, of maintaining high prices for farm products through conservation of the soil and other purposes. In 1931 we had increased the appropriation to $200,000,000 and also $89,000,000 for roads. In addition to this, $150,000,000 more was appropriated for marketing funds, and another $45,000,000 for relief of farms, or a grand total of $484,000,000.

In 1932 we appropriated $269,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture and $50,000,000 for roads. In 1933 we again appropriated $176,500,000 for the Department. In 1934 we appropriated $200,000,000 for loans to farmers, $100,000,000 to the Department itself, and $40,000,000 for crop-production loans. In 1935 there was appropriated $66,000,000 to the Department, $15,000,000 for agricultural adjustment, and $2,389,000 for the Farm Credit Administration, or another grand total of $83,389,000.

At this time we began in earnest to try and pay out more money for agriculture. In 1936 we gave the Department approximately $430,000,000, and another $296,000,000 under the agricultural-adjustment provisions of the law. A separate act of Congress this same year gave to the Department 30 percent of the gross customs receipts to be expended by the Department.

In 1937 we gave the Department $172,000,000 and $4,000,000 for the Farm Credit Administration.

In 1938, for all purposes, including roads, the Department received $1,100,000,000, and the Farm Credit Administration $4,000,000 more. Under the terms of the Sugar Act it received $39,750,000, besides a deficiency appropriation of $23,365,000 more, making in all $1,162,750,000.

Congress appropriated during the first session of this Congress $1,166,486,915 in addition to this $112,175,000 which was appropriated for aid for the farmers for the fiscal year ending in 1940.

I am not going to take the time of the Committee to go into details regarding the conditions of the American farmer today and the hopeless condition of agriculture in general. You have heard these facts and figures so often, it would only encumber the RECORD to rehearse them here again.

I should like, however, to call the Committee's attention to the total individual income taxes for the year 1937, which would not pay the amount appropriated for the Agriculture Department of the Government alone for this fiscal year.

Parity payments to agriculture has been taken out of this bill, also any amount to buy surplus commodities. The idea of parity payments to agriculture is all wrong. It is just like pouring water into a hole in the ground. So long as we have treaties with other nations permitting them to ship their cheap agricultural products into this country, such as we can produce here, with tariffs so low that we cannot compete with their cheap labor that produces these products in foreign countries, we can expect no change or relief for the American farmer.

In handling a program of this kind, it is just like an appropriation that is made to start dams and other irrigation and reclamation projects throughout the country, which now require constantly increasing appropriations to complete and maintain them. So with parity payments to agriculture—if we kept on adding other agricultural interests with the other parity payments already being made, we never would be able to tax the people of the United States enough to make even a slight showing to the farmer. I agree with the Secretary of Agriculture in the statement he made last year before a committee when he said:

Of course, you are aware of the fact that if you are to appropriate enough so that the payments added to the market prices of these five crops (wheat, cotton, corn, rye, and tobacco) affected by the parity payments were brought up to parity, the sum would be a very, very large sum. The $212,000,000 appropriated a year ago, you are aware, was only a fraction of the sum necessary to attain that objective.

What would result if we added other products such as dairy products to this list? I need not add to that statement further, because it speaks for itself. In other words, we cannot possibly tax our people sufficiently to maintain a price on our agricultural products that will compete against the world that produces these same products in foreign countries with labor they pay several hundred percent less than we pay our own labor. We cannot possibly raise our standards of living, because the higher price we provide for our own products only encourages larger importations of these foreign products to compete with our own, and the surplus supply continuously drives down our own prices. The only people who benefit are the people of these foreign countries.

We must protect the American farmer and his products; and if we do not, I cannot see anything but serious trouble ahead for agriculture.

We cannot go on borrowing money and taxing the people to raise the standard of living of people in foreign countries. We must maintain the standard of living and improve it for our own people first. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have not had the privilege of listening to this entire debate on the pending bill to make appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and the various agricultural activities. The Interior Subcommittee on Appropriations, of which I am acting chairman, is now in session and we have been holding hearings for several days. But I have endeavored to listen to as much of this debate as possible. I have been hopeful that someone would defend the provisions of the pending bill. We have just listened to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS], who has given a very splendid address containing some very valuable information on the subject of dairying and other business enterprises. The gentleman also offered some general criticisms, some of which are no doubt justified. But we listened intently for him to offer some constructive suggestions with reference to the provisions of the pending bill.

I think I am not unfair in saying that he did not offer one constructive suggestion, and I think I am also accurate in adding that he did not defend any of the so-called cuts or other provisions of the pending bill.

I have had the privilege of hearing two or three other gentlemen. I heard the very interesting and entertaining address made by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE]. I agree with much he said. I especially agree that farmers are entitled to cost of production for their products. But merely because farmers are not now receiving cost of production or reasonable prices for their farm commodities is no reason for throwing the entire farm program over, nor is it a valid excuse for sandbagging the farmers who are looking to this Congress hoping and praying for a few crumbs that might fall their way.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes. Inasmuch as I have mentioned the gentleman, I will gladly yield to him for a question.

Mr. JOHNS. In answer to the gentleman's statement that I have not offered any suggestions, I will say that I did not have time to complete my address, and if the gentleman will read it in the RECORD he will get those suggestions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I shall be glad to read the gentleman's very interesting and well-prepared address. In the meantime, I shall look forward eagerly to ascertain just what are his constructive suggestions.

I also listened to every word of the interesting address by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. Inasmuch as the minority members of the committee are said to have played a leading role in this sad drama to withhold from the farmers funds that will spell doom and defeat for many of them, I naturally expected the gentleman from New York to take this bill up and defend it, or at least discuss it in some detail; but, to my disappointment, he made his usual political speech. He insisted upon dealing in glittering generalities, except to advise us once more that he is against the New Deal and everything connected with this administration. Of course, it was no news that the genial gentleman from New York is against all the present farm program. He was against it when it was enacted, as he opposed practically every suggestion or recommendation made by the President of the United States. The gentleman from New York just cannot conceive of any good to the farmer in a farm bill under a Democratic administration.

It is not my prerogative to defend the present farm program. I have criticized it on many occasions. But it is a much better program than it was at the outset. All agree that there is still room for improvement, and I believe this Congress can and will improve the present farm program. It occurs to me, however, that as long as we have the present bill it is idle folly—it is unsportsmanlike and bad faith—for this committee to eliminate entirely all parity payments to the farmers.

May I say here that it has been my policy in the past to follow members of the committee who heard the evidence. I have always resolved any doubt in favor of the committee having charge of any bill. Moreover, I am in sympathy with the desire of members of the committee to economize wherever possible. May I remind Members that when the first annual appropriation bill for this session was reported to this House that I not only joined in the effort to economize but that I offered one motion and made the fight that reduced by $50,000,000 funds available next year for the American merchant marine. It is significant that some of the so-called leaders on both sides of this aisle who are now so rampant and determined to unreasonably slash appropriations to aid the distressed farmers did not support me in my successful fight to cut the subsidy of this Government for the merchant marine. So it appears that all depends upon whose "ox is gored" as whether men who cry from the housetops for economy in government really want real economy in government.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; I will be glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does the gentleman recall whether or not the last Republican National Convention went on record as promising the farmers of America that if they were put in power they would give the farmer parity and that the farmer was entitled to the equivalent of the tariff that industry had enjoyed all those years, and that the farmer had never been given? Does the gentleman remember that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Of course, I did not read that immortal, or otherwise, document. But in that I suspect that I am in the same position that probably a vast majority of millions of other people of the country occupy, but it seems that I do remember something like that being headlined in the daily papers.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does the gentleman recall whether our distinguished friends on the right have denied that their party made a statement like that, when they made a solemn party pledge to the people of America? I will ask the gentleman further whether or not he recalls the Democrats made some promises about like that at that time, promising to give the farmer parity for his products?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Oh, yes; I remember all that. The fact is, if I recall correctly, each party endeavored as best it could to out-promise the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Then I will ask my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma further, judging from what has happened in the preparation of this bill up to this time, does it not look like the Congress, and by that I mean those sitting on both the right and left side of the aisle, is getting ready to sell the farmers of America down the road, as they have been sold for many years in the past? Does that not just about size up the situation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman is just speaking out what many of us have been thinking for the past several hours. I thank the gentleman for his very valuable contribution. But, confidentially, unless the pending bill is amended materially, I, for one, shall refuse to support it. [Applause.]

Yes; we have been waiting in vain for someone today to really try to defend the indefensible cuts in this bill. I suggested to one of the gentlemen yesterday when this bill was reported by the subcommittee that we were shocked and surprised at its action in eliminating the entire farm-tenancy program, the dry-land agricultural experiment stations, the water-facilities item, and other indefensible and unreasonable, wholesale cuts. I was undiplomatic enough to ask the chairman point blank why such cuts were made. He repeatedly stated, "We had to cut somewhere." That was the very illuminating information which the full committee received on yesterday—"We had to cut somewhere." Why did we have to cut somewhere and why did the farmer have to take the brunt of such wholesale slashes?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The farmer in the past has always been the first to get a cut. Is not this just a carrying out of the tradition of the political parties of America to make the farmer the first victim of a cut when one is administered?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman has answered his own question very well.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; I yield for a brief question.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. This will be a very short question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Why is it that both last year and this year the President of the United States refused to submit to the Budget the item for parity payment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am not, of course, a White House spokesman, but it is, of course, natural that gentlemen from the Republican side of this House Chamber just cannot help from taking a slap at the President at every opportunity.

Now let us be fair about this. I challenge the gentleman or any Member on his side of the aisle to find one statement from the President against parity payments to farmers. But the President has said that if parity payments are made to farmers that this Congress should find a method of providing funds to pay for such payments. It is unnecessary for me to defend the present President of the United States. He has managed in the past to pretty well take care of himself. [Applause.] The fact that the President was able to increase his vote from 21,000,000 plus in 1932 to 27,400,000 plus in 1936 would indicate that the farmers were pretty well pleased with Roosevelt and his farm program. I might add that even with these unreasonably low prices, droughts, and hard times that the average farmer is in a whale of a lot better shape today than he was in the dark, never-to-be-forgotten days when prosperity "Hoovered" around the corner too long. [Applause.] Now, let us discuss briefly some of the specific cuts to which many of us so seriously object.

First and foremost, let us bear in mind that the cuts in nearly every instance do not come in the bureaus downtown, but in the field—out where they hurt the farmer. If you will examine this bill from beginning to end, you will find that the boys down behind the big mahogany desks are not the ones who are getting the serious reductions.

A year ago, when this bill was up for consideration, I pointed out, for example, that the Soil Conservation Service was not getting a cut in the Washington office; but that, on the other hand, the Bureau was growing by leaps and bounds, and the cut that was being made was in the field. Let me now remind Members that in this bill, so far as the Soil Conservation Service is concerned, one of the most drastic and serious reductions is for these regularly organized soil-conservation districts. In my State we have encouraged the farmers to organize these districts, and they have been told that they would be given technical information and advice from the Soil Conservation Service. They have recently organized some 25 or 30 such districts in the State of Texas, for example. Not one such district is now in operation, if I am advised correctly, in that State. But farmers of Texas have had it held out to them that when Congress in this regular appropriation bill makes funds available for that purpose, that they were assured of adequate technical service. Some 27 or 30 soil districts have been organized in my own State, Oklahoma; and the people of those areas are just waiting and watching Congress and wondering when the money will become available so they can have their districts in operation. To preserve American soil now will help make the future of our great country secure.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to my good friend from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. After years of educating the farmers to the benefits of soil conservation and getting them to the point where they are eager for it, then it is proposed here to cut down on the appropriation that enables it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is true. We not only refuse to take care of these soil-conservation districts that have been organized but in many instances districts already organized will have to be abandoned, and we shall have to tell the farmers that we are sorry, but the cuts just had to come. "We had to cut somewhere." That is what our distinguished chairman told us over and over, and so it was decided to again have the poor old farmer take it on the chin. But bear in mind that they did not seriously reduce any of the bureaus in Washington, of course; they did not cut out a single mahogany-desk or swivel-chair job in Washington. The farmers, who farm the farms in Washington, are safe and secure. What I am complaining about is that these drastic cuts are all made in the field, where the farmer really gets some benefit. This ought to be called a Farm Bureau bill, not a farm bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota, a member of the committee.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The Soil Conservation Bureau this year will be cooperating with 235 soil-conservation districts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am informed that they expect there will be 420 of these districts in the coming year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is also correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The amount carried in the bill, however, will permit cooperation with only 190 districts, which is less than the number in operation this year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for that definite information. That is the situation with which this Congress is faced at this moment. I wish I could go on and discuss it at length, but I must pass to another phase of the bill. Let us now discuss another very important situation, the dry-land stations.

This committee has decided that the work of the agricultural dry-land stations was all a mistake—not partly a mistake, but all a mistake.

Congress established these dry-land stations in several arid and semiarid States. All of these stations have done marvelous work. There is no question but they have justified their existence. The Government has hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in property and land in these stations, yet now at one fell swoop this committee proposes to close these stations, practically all of them. They have listed nine that are certain to close under the Budget estimate. Then the committee, without making a full, fair investigation of the activities of such stations, makes an additional cut of $75,000 without rhyme or reason and the committee admits its action without any evidence. It is further admitted that such agricultural experiment stations are rendering valuable service to farmers of their respective areas.

One of such stations we are told must go is in Lawton, southwest Oklahoma. I am familiar with its splendid work over a period of several years. I have attended several meetings of farmers held at this particular dry-land station near the city of Lawton, Okla. Farmers from several counties were present at that meeting. They testified to the good work being done by that one dry-land station, a real functioning station with a marvelous program; yet, under the provisions of this bill that station and 12 or 15 other dry-land stations throughout the country are to be not reduced, but actually abandoned. I might add that members of the Appropriations Committee were not accorded the courtesy of being permitted to appear this year in support of the appropriation for the continuation of these stations in their own congressional districts.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MAHON. I take advantage of this opportunity to say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that he is correct in defending the work which has been done by these dry-land stations. They have been doing this work at a minimum of cost compared to the tremendous influence they have had among literally thousands of farmers and hundreds of farm communities throughout the Nation. I shall wholeheartedly support the amendment to restore the dry-land experiment station work. The cost is small—the good results immeasurable.

The station at Big Spring, Tex., is within my own congressional district and I know from first-hand observation about the good work being done there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for his valuable contribution. I wish I could spend more time on that important item, but I must hurry on.

Another item that has been entirely eliminated is the water-facilities item of $500,000. What is that for? To eliminate swivel-chair jobs downtown? No, no; they must not be touched. It is for farm ponds for farmers in Oklahoma and several other States. It involves only small projects, and is now in successful operation in several States—western, southern, and midwestern—and a really worth-while program for the farmers is now being carried out under direction of the Soil Conservation Service in cooperation with other agencies.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In the interest of accuracy I think it should be stated that the report carries a specific recommendation that the item for water facilities be transferred to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for that statement. I hope it will be transferred, and adequate appropriation made because, certainly, the work must go on. We cannot take a backward step so far as the water-facilities program is concerned.

There is another item here dealing with surplus agricultural commodities. I am not going to criticize the committee with reference to that because it probably would have gone out on a point of order anyway. I think it is generally agreed that that set-up called the food-stamp set-up has done a marvelous job in many States of the Union. We have heard no criticism from the committee or others. This set-up as you know provides for the sale at a very low rate of surplus farm commodities to the underpaid, low-paid citizens throughout the country and to those who have no jobs at all. Many cities and towns in the district I have the honor to represent in Congress are clamoring for this so-called food-stamp set-up. It has been very successful, and I am sure the action of the committee is no indication that it did not approve of the very fine work that is being done. I am hopeful that the appropriation will be made, and I believe that before Congress adjourns it will be.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to the meat in the coconut, the farm-tenancy program, which is about the only thing that has been really criticized here this afternoon. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] spent most of his time, after talking in generalities against the entire Roosevelt administration, in speaking against the farm-tenancy program. If I understood him correctly, he said when you figure it one way the average cost of these farms for farm tenants was $30,000 each. That was his way of figuring it. Yet the gentleman from Texas insists that the correct figure of the average cost to the Government for farms sold on a long-time period to these tenants is around $4,000.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. In the State of Georgia the figures I gave were between three and four thousand dollars. I have since secured from Mr. Baldwin the exact figures throughout the Nation, which are $5,395. I would like the Record to show that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman very much for that definite, authentic information. By no stretch of his imagination could the figure in any State, to say nothing of the average, be near $30,000. Just where the distinguished objector from New York got his figures of $30,000 is a problem that I seriously doubt if even he himself could possibly explain.

Mr. SOUTH. The first figure I gave related to the State of Georgia. The figure of $5,395 covers the entire Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct; and I hope we have heard the last of those unreasonable figures of $30,000, $20,000, or even $10,000 as the average cost of such farms. The gentleman from New York and others have been consistent in their opposition to this farm-tenancy program. Several of them opposed it in its inception. I am not surprised at their criticism of it today. When the first appropriation of $10,000,000 was made, the gentleman from New York and several other gentlemen on both sides of the aisle opposed it very vigorously. What was the argument then advanced? Why, they said, it is just a drop in the bucket; that is not enough to really do a worth-while job. When the next appropriation of $15,000,000 was made, the same gentlemen cried out in unison, "That is not sufficient." But still they opposed it. The next year, when the appropriation was $25,000,000, again they said, "It is not enough," and Congress overwhelmingly voted down the objectors to this farm-tenancy program. If I remember correctly, the Congress raised the amount allowed by this same committee last year from $25,000,000 to $40,000,000 for the farm-tenancy program.

Again this year the committee insists upon taking a backward step because "we must cut somewhere." It proposed to go back to $25,000,000 in the interest of economy. Then at the last moment, with one fell swoop, the committee eliminates the entire amount because, forsooth, under this appropriation they discover that it will be impossible to secure a home for every tenant farmer in the United States. If you will read history you will find that when the Speaker's father was in the Senate of the United States, and that great man of courage and foresight was fighting to start a great highway program throughout the country, pleading for national highways, the objectors said: "Why, $50,000 to start such a proposal is ridiculous. Fifty thousand dollars will not build all of the highways over the country that need to be constructed. It is just a drop in the bucket." They used the same argument then against Federal highways that has been used consistently against this farm-tenancy program.

Some of you can remember when it was suggested that the farmers of this country should be entitled to free rural delivery. What was the argument against that proposal? At first you recall that rural free delivery was begun on a very modest appropriation of a few million dollars. At that time the perpetual objectors argued that we could not then or ever hope to bring free mail delivery to all the farmers, therefore such an experiment would be unfair to those who were denied that service. They opposed it and put it off and ridiculed it because, they said, "Who can conceive of giving the rural population a free delivery?" But who today would think of opposing a highway bill or a free rural delivery bill simply because all of the people cannot have a highway and all of the people cannot have free rural delivery?

Coming down to modern history, I can remember going down to the White House early in this administration with various committees. Especially do I recall that the President of the United States, early in his first administration, suggesting to a committee of a few Republicans and several Democrats that something ought to be done for the youth of the land. He suggested to that committee that there ought to be some kind of camp set up for the unemployed youth of America. I can remember very well how some of the early objectors to anything the President wanted boldly refusing to go along with the President's suggestion. The President's ideas of aiding unemployed youth were ridiculed then by some who just could not believe a Democratic President could make good.

"Mr. President, you cannot possibly do it," they cried. "It would break the Government to take care of all the unemployed youths in the land. You might just as well forget it." But the President did not forget. Some of those who thought then only in terms of partisan politics offered the same old argument that is being used against the Farm Tenancy Act now. But the President, in spite of criticism, did not then retreat. He went right ahead and, thank God, demanded that Congress establish the C. C. C. camps, where between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 youths have been able to find themselves and get a new lease on life. All agree now that the C. C. C. has justified its existence, but it took some time to make a real, functioning organization. No one wants to abandon all of the C. C. C. camps merely because we are unable to care for all of the youths of the land. And who would dare stand here now and say that he is opposed to the C. C. C. program?

I recall later when the President suggested to the Members of this Congress that they establish the National Youth Administration to permit youth to attend high schools and colleges that there were some so-called leaders and alleged leaders and would-be leaders who pounded the President's desk and said, "You cannot do it, Mr. President. You would break the Government. It is unconstitutional, and if it is not unconstitutional then it must be socialistic." The President could not get this Congress to pass such a measure, but he took the proverbial bull by the horns and issued an Executive order establishing the National Youth Administration. He was criticized from this floor for trying to dictate to Congress, yet what Member on either side of this aisle would stand here today and demand the elimination of the N. Y. A., which is doing so much for the youth of the land?

Yet, by the same token and by the same silly argument, we see gentlemen arise here and solemnly declare that because we will expend only $40,000,000 on the farm-tenancy program during the present year—and we are just getting started on that great program—because we have not been able to take care of all the farm tenants in the land we should wipe out the program entirely. These gentlemen seriously contend that, despite the fine record made, despite the fact that farm tenants have paid 159 percent of the payments due the Government, a record far beyond our expectations, that we should now take a defeatist attitude and say that farm tenancy cannot be solved.

Mr. Chairman, if this Congress does not do something for the homeless, landless farmers of America, another Congress sometime in the future will do so. We cannot ostrichlike close our eyes to this growing farm-tenancy problem. It is not and should not be a partisan matter. Let us continue this important program. Deep in the breast of every homeless, landless farmer is the desire to some day become a home owner. Shall we by our vote here say to him and his family that there is no hope for the future? Let me appeal to all fair-minded men to restore this farm-tenancy item, and by so doing do the square and the humane thing for the homeless and helpless farmers of America. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe the agricultural legislation passed during the present administration has been generally beneficial. I trust we shall be able to perfect that legislation.

It is easy to criticize and it is difficult to build or construct. The committee in charge of the bill under consideration has pointed out the real weakness of the Agricultural Adjustment and Domestic Allotment Act. This act contemplates and in fact assures to agriculture a price adjustment. It is regrettable that no definite provision has been made for making price adjustments.

The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], in his opening statement called on the legislative committee to initiate, report, and have the Congress pass legislation to make definite provision for the payment of parity. We have had much helpful discussion during the past 2 days. I hesitate to detain the Committee at this late hour, but I believe the committee in charge of this appropriation is warranted in asking the Congress to make definite provision for that which is contemplated by existing law. I am going to take the liberty of suggesting what I believe to be a constructive solution of the problem of parity.

It is universally admitted that the protective tariff is not effective for agricultural products, of which we produce an exportable surplus. Cotton and wheat are, therefore, handicapped by the protective tariff. Those who advocate such tariffs do not advocate them for revenue; they advocate them for protection. I maintain that the growers of these and similar crops are entitled to the equivalent of the benefit accorded to the manufacturer.

We are all agreed as to the objective. I am alarmed, Mr. Chairman, when I think of the widening spread between the income of industrial workers, on the one hand, resulting from such acts as the Wagner Act and the Wage and Hour Act, and the smaller increases in the income of agricultural workers. We are all agreed, as I have stated, as to the objective. A number of approaches have been suggested. The original Agricultural Adjustment Act carried a processing tax, but this has been declared unconstitutional. A general manufacturers' sales tax has been suggested, but consumers protest. The Secretary of Agriculture has suggested the certificate plan. These plans have their merits.

The customs duties collected annually by the United States during the past 4 years have run from $319,000,000 to $487,000,000. I am aware of the provision known as section 32 of the original Agricultural Act, which provides for the disposition of surplus commodities. I have in mind the amendment of that act in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. I propose not to repeal the Agricultural Adjustment and Domestic Allotment Act but to perfect it and to provide permanently and definitely that the customs duties be used in providing parity payments for agriculture under that act. I am suggesting this because, while this is not a legislative bill, the committee in charge has called on the Congress to provide permanent and definite legislation to solve this problem.

I am suggesting an amendment to the Agricultural Act that will definitely provide—and I give you substantially the language—that our customs receipts be turned over to the Commodity Credit Corporation. We have not been able to obtain a parity price under the program. I am suggesting 75 percent of a parity price. The Agricultural Act contemplates loans. In fact, loans are mandatory. If the proceeds of the customs duties were turned over to the Commodity Credit Corporation, there would be guaranteed 75 percent of parity and the surplus would be sold at the world price in foreign markets at world prices. The provision I have in mind would stipulate that all unappropriated customs duties as provided by section 32 as amended shall be turned over to the Commodity Credit Corporation for the purposes mentioned. In the event this were insufficient to provide for the necessary parity moneys at any time—because I realize that the customs duties vary in different years and have varied during the past 4 years in the figures that I gave, the duties for 1936 being $386,000,000; for 1937, $487,000,000; for 1938, $356,000,000; and for 1939, $390,000,000—there should be imposed on manufacturers in proportion as they are benefited by the tariff a sales tax to make up the deficit. I call attention to the fact that 30 percent of the customs receipts have already been devoted to the disposition of surplus crops.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this provision, automatic and self-executing, is worthy of the consideration of the committees and of the Congress. It has many advantages, and certainly it does not have many of the disadvantages of a processing tax, of a general manufacturers' sales tax, or of the certificate plan. The processing tax is not fair to cotton; we export about 50 percent. We export about 10 percent of our wheat. It is not fair, because it does not fall on all alike. The certificate plan, having many advantages as it does, is a tax on the consumers of the country.

The tax that I propose is that the funds the Government of the United States realizes from protecting manufacturers shall be devoted to those who are handicapped by that protection, and that in the event the amount is insufficient, it be supplemented by a tax upon the manufacturers in proportion to the protection afforded.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOLEY. The funds or customs receipts to which the gentleman refers now go into the General Treasury. Is not that true?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes; except 30 percent of them.

Mr. COOLEY. And the effect of what the gentleman is proposing to do is to pay the full amount of customs receipts from the General Treasury and make them available for agriculture.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am proposing to do in a larger way just what, in the answer to the gentleman's question, his committee did when that committee provided under section 32 of the original act that 30 percent of these customs duties shall be automatically and permanently appropriated for the disposition of surplus products, and the amendment that I have in mind would be in substantially this language:

Instead of making a definite commitment for 30 percent, I contemplate a statute that would provide that the entire 100 percent of the duties shall be utilized for the purposes I mention.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I propose an amendment in substantially this language to the existing Agricultural Act:

In order to maintain a reasonable domestic price which shall be 75 percent of parity price, through loans by Commodity Credit Corporation, and in order to maintain our fair share of export markets, all import duties not heretofore allocated shall from this date be paid to the Commodity Credit Corporation to be applied as repayments on outstanding loans, plus carrying charges in an amount sufficient to reduce said loans to the lowest delivered world price plus 5 percent handling charges to the exporter and farmer. An equivalent remuneration is to be paid by the Commodity Credit Corporation to the exporter of goods or articles 90 percent of which are agricultural products, all as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. COOLEY. If the gentleman will yield at that point, the point I want to make is that the gentleman's proposal would deplete the Federal Treasury to the extent of 30 percent of the duties collected.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes; and of all duties collected.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman is proposing to do in a very direct way what has otherwise been sought to be accomplished by parity payments.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I always like to be direct.

Mr. COOLEY. I am not objecting to what the gentleman is proposing.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am glad to have your statement. I am proposing in a direct and in a permanent way to solve a problem that is on the doorstep of the Congress now, and I am proposing what I believe to be a fair and a just solution of the problem.

Mr. COOLEY. Does not the gentleman believe, though, in view of the situation that exists at the present time, and our inability to get even $225,000,000 for the benefit of agriculture, we are rather optimistic in hoping to be able to set apart 100 percent of the import duties?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I answer the gentleman by saying it is rather easy to go along and to not make any definite provisions, but it is hazardous. I am undertaking to answer the criticism not only of the committee in charge of this bill, but the criticism that has been leveled at Congress, to wit, that the Congress of the United States has made no definite provision for the payment of parity, and if you or your committee have a better solution, or a more nearly sound solution, or a more nearly just solution than that which I propose, I shall gladly follow you; but I believe we have gone long enough without any solution whatever. [Applause.]

While I have not actually introduced a bill to effectuate the purposes I now advocate, I may say that I have, for years, been committed to the principle that the import duties collected by the Government should be devoted to the payment of parities on agricultural products of which we produce exportable surpluses.

Section 32 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act has a kindred purpose in mind. It only provides for 30 percent of customs duties. I would utilize all customs duties to protect agricultural products handicapped by the protective tariff. I trust that the Committee on Agriculture, of which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] is a distinguished member, will give consideration to permanent legislation to provide for parities, and to the proposal that I have outlined, which I will be glad to submit in the form of a bill.

While the amendment that I propose would only provide for the unappropriated customs duties for parities, the more I think about the matter the more thoroughly convinced I am that all customs duties should be utilized for parities. If it is necessary to provide for the disposition of surplus commodities primarily for those in need I am agreeable to other legislation for this purpose.

Again, if all of the customs duties are utilized to provide parities, it might eliminate the suggestion for a manufacturers' sales tax for any additional funds not supplied by the customs duties to provide parities.

I believe that the Agricultural Adjustment Act should make definite provision. I proposed broadly that customs duties be automatically appropriated as outlined to provide parities.

I am not alarmed by the use of the word "subsidy." A tariff is nothing more nor less than a subsidy. Parities are tariffs in reverse. There should be a tariff for all or for none. [Applause.]

Under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I should like to say that the amendment I have proposed was submitted to me by Mr. O. F. Bledsoe, of Mississippi. Mr. Bledsoe is, and has been for some 20 years, president of the Staple Cotton Cooperative Association of Greenwood, Miss. He advocates the principle of allocating customs duties to provide parities. He is a successful cotton grower; has given much thought to the cotton problem; he is practical. He is not only a successful cotton grower but he is a successful administrator of a cooperative association. His association has been particularly successful in merchandising cotton.

Having advocated for years that customs duties be utilized to provide parities, I am glad to accord Mr. Bledsoe full credit for the amendment which I have proposed as a permanent solution of the problem of financing parities.

I believe that the proposal of Mr. Bledsoe and the proposal that I have outlined constitute the most practical and sound approach to the solution of the parity problem. The program is thus put on a permanent footing. It is, therefore, permanent legislation.

I summarize my proposal by saying:

First. Seventy-five percent of a parity price will be provided for cotton, wheat, and other similar products.

Second. An equivalent remuneration will be paid to the exporter of goods or articles 90 percent of which are agricultural products.

Third. If additional money is needed, a sales tax on tariff-protected articles can be levied in proportion to their protection. The details can be worked out by legislation.

ADVANTAGES

(a) The program is automatic; it is self-executing.

(b) Surplus products will be sold abroad at world prices.

(c) The program is to use import duties to provide that cotton, wheat, corn, and other agricultural products shall have the equivalent of the benefits accorded to manufactures under the protective tariff.

(d) The collection and distribution of tax money would not be required.

(e) It has all of the virtues and none of the faults or vices of the processing tax, the manufacturers' sales tax, or the certificate plan.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAWKS].

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting here for 2 days listening to the debate on this bill and I am reminded of a story I heard sometime ago. Perhaps some of you have heard it. A young recruit was sent up to the front line long before he was prepared for such duty. The attack had started and they were shooting off their rifles and the captain noticed that the bullets that were coming out of Private Jones' gun were landing right in among his own troops. He rushed over to Private Jones and snapped him to attention and said, "Private Jones, do you have any idea where the bullets from your gun are going?" Private Jones clicked his heels, saluted, and said, "No, sir, Captain; all I know is that when they leave here they go with a hell of a bang." That is just about the way this debate has been on this particular bill, and that story just about sums up the New Deal. It started with a bang, but had no direction, and consequently has arrived nowhere.

For some reason or other the Congress of the United States does not seem to be getting any place in the solution of the agricultural problem. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] got up here and accused my colleagues, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], of making purely political speeches. I noticed he did a pretty good job on a purely political speech himself when he started out. The only difference I can find between his speech and the speech of my colleague from Wisconsin was that he needed help, while the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS] did not. [Laughter.]

The question has been asked during the debate on this bill, Why do we have to cut appropriations?

Why do we have to cut this appropriation to the farmers? I have to go back home to try to find that answer, and I find it in just this one reason, that the farmers throughout this country who have been paying the bill just cannot afford to pay it any longer. I know it is nice. I know this farm-tenancy program and other panaceas are nice on paper. I know you can get up here and be social-minded in your attitude, but are you going to destroy the whole program, are you going to destroy the very things that have built this country just because you happen to be social-minded and want to take care of a few of the unfortunate people in this country? I do not know how those who are working hard for a living, those who are really producing the goods that are consumed in this country, and trying to get ahead and trying to keep their heads above water, can do so much longer with the spending program that is going on as it has gone for the past 7½ years. You say we are not in trouble? You say we are not at the danger point? Then you are admitting that $45,000,000,000 of debt is not dangerous to our entire economic structure. Then you are admitting that going from three to five billion dollars a year in the red is not a dangerous procedure. Then you are admitting that your program that has left us with about 10,000,000 unemployed, that has left us without a solution of this farm problem, that has left us with the tenant problem, a program that has left us with every major problem which you on this side of the aisle refer to as Hoover problems, problems that were created by the Republican administration under President Hoover, as you say, has failed. You are admitting that we still have every one of those problems, and I have to admit that we do have them, and you have failed.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWKS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SOUTH. Perhaps a part of that is correct, but it is a fact that the national income went to less than $40,000,000,000 under Hoover, and it is about $68,000,000,000 now. That is a substantial improvement.

Mr. HAWKS. All right. Where did our debt go?

Mr. SOUTH. Where did it go? We were increasing it under Hoover and we have been increasing it since.

Mr. HAWKS. I will say we have. We have only increased it some twenty-odd billion dollars under your administration. But, my friends, I do not want to make this thing a partisan question. God knows the problems we have at home, the problems we have in Wisconsin are just as serious as the problems you have in Texas. It is just like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] said the other day, "this thing is serious." We must rise above the kind of partisan politics that has been displayed on this floor in the past 2 days. Unless we do, there is not going to be any Congress of the United States, and I will not have the pleasure of standing here looking into your fine countenances. We must take this problem of agriculture, which I think is basic, and correct it right down at the roots. We have to realize that there is not going to be any general prosperity in this country until we get the farmer back on his feet. Is that not true?

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWKS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman outline in a few sentences the program which he would suggest?

Mr. HAWKS. If I could outline a farm program in a few sentences I would probably be the next President of the United States.

Mr. PIERCE. Well, in many sentences, then.

Mr. HAWKS. I do not have the time. We have been working on this for 20 years. This is not a New Deal or Democratic problem alone. This problem goes back to long before your party came into office. This problem started in 1920 right after the war, and has been growing steadily worse. We have been trying to pay the farmers during the past 7 years out of surplus earnings of other people for something that we could not do or have not been able to do legislatively, and do it on a sound basis. If we are going to stand here year after year and admit that we cannot solve this farm problem, then we had better quit. Then we had better look for a new form of government; we had better look for some kind of government that can solve it. But I maintain that we can. I maintain that this Congress can solve it.

I am here today primarily to talk about one item in this bill, and that is the Forest Products Laboratory, which is located in my district in Madison, Wis. I know that the people back in Madison are deeply interested in this laboratory. The Governor, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] was there only this winter and he knows of the good work that that laboratory is doing and the money they are saving in the forestry industry alone. That particular laboratory has been cut again some $68,000.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAWKS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PIERCE. I want to say that that is one of the real things that our committee solved. We saw that laboratory and the work you are doing.

Mr. HAWKS. I thank the gentleman. I honestly believe that every dollar appropriated to the Forest Products Laboratory in Wisconsin is returned manifold.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAWKS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PIERCE. Tell us the reason that was given for the cut.

Mr. HAWKS. I have not found any reason. There is not any reason in the report that I can find. All I know is that year after year, before the Subcommittee on Appropriations on agriculture we have had a hard time to keep around a six or seven hundred thousand dollar appropriation, when the original budgetary recommendation was a million dollars.

We have never been able to get it. Last year, with the supplemental appropriation, I think we got right around $700,000.

Since they built this new laboratory out there they have been constantly whittling away at the appropriation. If it were something that did not amount to anything, if it were something that was a drain upon the country and the resources of the country, I would have no objection to the cut, but here is an institution that is giving something worth while; that is giving jobs, pouring dollars into pay rolls in this country; yet year after year after year they have had to fight for their very existence.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HAWKS. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. The value of the laboratory is in developing uses for waste products, as we saw when we went through the laboratory last year, how they had found uses for things that used to be thrown away.

Mr. HAWKS. The gentleman is correct.

For the benefit of those Members who will not have time to read this huge report let me point out some of the things in which the laboratory is interested and active. They are interested in timber harvesting and conversion investigations, in lumber, forest-products statistics investigations, pulp and paper investigations—and the pulp industry alone in this country did a $1,300,000,000 business last year. This laboratory is interested in the investigation of the strength of wood, seasoning, and the physical properties of wood, in chemical investigations and wood utilization, in wood preservation investigations, wood structure and growth investigations.

I wish every Member of this House could go into that laboratory as the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] and the committee did last winter and see the splendid work they are doing and the help they are giving industry and what they are doing down South. By the way, it was the Forest Products Laboratory which was largely responsible for the new paper mill down in Texas. They did a lot of the work and contributed a great deal toward the creation of that particular industry. They have opened up the yellow-pine industry down there in the paper-making field to an extent never before dreamed of, meaning added savings for Americans and also jobs for American citizens.

This laboratory appropriation has been cut $68,000. While I have been one of the most economy-minded Members of the House since I have been here, still I cannot see how you can keep on whittling away on something that is constantly adding to the total wealth of this country; something that is steadily adding to the pay rolls of this country. I do not see how you can justify such performance.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the only reasons assigned to the drastic reduction in appropriations for agriculture and direct benefits to the farmers in bringing in this bill is that the situation of the Federal Treasury is such that economy is necessary. The fact that appropriations by Congress in previous sessions have crowded the Federal debt nearly to the limit fixed by Congress, and that there will be a further deficit this fiscal year, is brought forth with much emphasis. There will be other appropriation bills coming up later, and it would be interesting to know if the reduction of 45 percent in this particular measure shall be extended to other expenditures of the Government. If not, it would be even more interesting to learn why agriculture is called upon to take such a huge reduction in appropriations.

I join in the protests voiced by Members yesterday as to the manner of bringing in bills of such magnitude and rushing them through without giving the Members an opportunity to study the hearings or the report, much less the bill itself. The report and hearings on this bill were not available to the Members of the House until yesterday morning, and practically no time has been allowed Members to familiarize themselves with the extensive reduction which the committee proposes.

The expenditures for agriculture for this fiscal year will be $1,185,115,000. The administration Budget committee reported very great reductions in that amount to $780,904,519. Now comes the Committee on Appropriations asking that Congress will consent to a further reduction of $154,530,263, making the amount available for all agricultural purposes, including the administration expenses in the Department, approximately $636,000,000.

In this attempt to evoke economy at the expense of the farmers I would call attention to the recent deficiency bill, in which $267,000,000 were voted by the House for additional expenditures for the Army and Navy this year. The Senate reduced that amount to approximately $245,000,000, and it is likely to be signed and become a law in that amount. That appropriation is an addition to the very liberal funds provided for the Army and Navy at the former session of Congress.

There is now pending before the Naval Committees of both Houses a proposal that there shall be $1,300,000,000 of additional appropriations authorized for expanding the Navy. It is not likely that Congress will sanction such an extravagant appropriation for naval expenditures even in the stress of the present war scares, but it is quite evident with the alarming prophecies regarding the dangers of the war in Europe, and further alarmist propaganda regarding the danger of our being drawn into a war with Japan, that the naval appropriations will be greatly added to at this session of Congress. While I believe in adequate national defense, I am not among those who respond to this widespread propaganda for a huge armament program preparing our country to engage in war with all the rest of the world.

In his recommendation to Congress the President suggested new taxes of $450,000,000 to take care of the increased naval appropriations. There is no present indication that the recommendation of the President will be adopted. In fact, the leaders in both the House and Senate seem not inclined to favor a tax bill in a Presidential campaign year. Regardless of the condition of the Treasury, the size of the deficit, or the approach to the debt limit, there is not a very strong probability of a tax being levied for war-preparation purposes.

That situation may have been taken into consideration in this particular move for economy in striking out appropriations for parity payments, the purchase of surplus commodities, farm-tenancy program, rural electrification, and other purposes of agriculture. In other words, to reduce the deficit occasioned by naval appropriations, the farmers of the country are called upon to make the sacrifice. Instead of new taxes levied on all the people, there is to be this reduction in appropriations for agriculture. It amounts to the same thing as taxing the farmers by reducing their income for these extended war preparations. In other words, taxing the barnyards to expand the navy yards. I do not approve of that kind of economy.

That the farmers of the country are aware of this move is evidenced by a telegram which I received last evening from the Buffalo County Farmers Equity Union, a strong farm organization in one of the most fertile and enterprising agricultural centers of Wisconsin. It is as follows:

Farmers desperate. Demand parity on all products. Oppose present budget.

BUFFALO COUNTY FARMERS EQUITY UNION,
ADOLPH MAASEN, President.

Still another telegram is at hand this morning from Mr. Albert H. Wahl, president of the Menomonee Farmers Equity Union, which consists of a large membership of dairy farmers, in which he states, "We need farm legislation instead of armament appropriations."

Undoubtedly I shall receive many communications of the kind in the mails in the next few days. Farmers are desperate in my section of the State, and their desperation is increased by the thought that their income is to be reduced under the guise of economy while preparations are made for expanding the National Budget by appropriations for other purposes.

The amount appropriated for parity payments the past year was $225,000,000. Some try to believe that the war in Europe may so increase agricultural prices that prices may be raised to parity without this appropriation. We passed the naval deficiency bill appropriating the additional $267,000,000 regardless of its effect upon the Budget, and the committee now would strike out the $225,000,000 of direct appropriations for farmers upon the mere hope that the war may increase agricultural exports and add to the agricultural income. There is no indication that such will be the case, as England and France are buying less of agricultural products from us than they were a year ago. Our farm problem will not be solved by foreign markets or foreign policies. It is our responsibility to do our part toward its solution now.

There are differences of opinion as to the success of the general program for agriculture under which we are working. I have been among its critics. I have objected to its limitations as well as to the advantages which it brings to some sections of our country and the lesser benefits to other sections. I have not believed that the one-fourth of our farmers engaged in dairying with a product value of nearly $2,000,000,000 annually, the largest branch of agriculture, should be deprived of a share in such a farm policy while the principal benefits are confined to those producing cotton, corn, wheat, rice, and tobacco. A policy which discriminates between farmers of a few sections and those of many other sections is as unjust as has long been the unfair discrimination between industry and commerce and agriculture in general.

Regardless of differing opinions as to the general farm program, it must be conceded that it will be continued for the time being. The main issue is whether or not we shall make it more effective, more beneficial, or hamstringing the program by restricting its operations.

Our Wisconsin dairymen feel that they have been unjustly deprived of the benefits they might have received under the farm policy. Their payments have been small as compared to those received by the farmers of other States. They rightfully believe that they should be included, and they are demanding that dairy products shall be included among the basic commodities along with corn, cotton, wheat, rice, and tobacco.

H. R. 6500 and H. R. 6530, identical measures, presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Congressman GEHRMANN, and myself, are measures upon which our dairy farmers demand action. These measures were formulated under the direction of the Farmers' Equity Union and the Wisconsin Dairy Parity League. Hearings were held by a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture last July. A large delegation of dairymen came from Wisconsin, and others from Minnesota and New York, to voice their approval of these measures and urge their adoption. Included were President Kenneth W. Hones, president of the Wisconsin Farmers' Equity Union, and William H. Bundy, president of the Wisconsin Dairy Parity League. The hearings were adjourned without day. We are endeavoring to have them completed, hoping for a favorable report and later for prompt action by Congress to include dairy commodities under the parity policy.

These measures have been discussed before hundreds of farm meetings and many business associations and commercial clubs in both Wisconsin and Minnesota. Thousands of farmers are interested in them and are demanding action.

Now comes the report of the Budget committee, striking out all parity funds, and the House committee accedes apparently without protest. To the farmers who benefited directly by parity payments and to all others who are demanding a share in the program, the present bill denies even consideration. Budget balancers and economy advocates join hands with the proponents of a world-dominating navy in the endeavor to reduce farm income and farm buying power at a time when the very plight of agriculture continues to be the principal cause of a continuing depression, with its industrial distress, unemployment, direct relief, and all else which come with it and will remain with it until agriculture is reestablished on a parity basis.

It is to be hoped that the House will amend the measure before us, provide funds for parity payments, at least to the extent of 75 percent of parity as the program now provides, and in sufficient amount to permit dairy products to also be included in the parity program. If it fails to do so, it will serve notice on agriculture that "economy" starts on the farm, and, if other appropriations are not to be similarly reduced, it must end on the farm.

Reduction of the funds for surplus-commodity purchases and distribution by $72,000,000 will occasion losses to farmers far in excess of that amount, as such purchases have served to reduce surpluses and stabilize marketing conditions. It will also lessen the supplies to thousands of families on relief in the large cities; increase the effect of alleged overproduction by furthering more underconsumption. Farmers get their benefits from these expenditures by better marketing conditions only. The destitute people of the industrial centers obtain the direct benefit. Reduction of the funds by nearly 40 percent means the piling away of food surpluses in the warehouses, to the great detriment of farmers and consumers alike.

In 1938 the Surplus Commodities Corporation purchased 152,000,000 pounds of butter and other dairy products for the double purpose of supplying the needy families who otherwise would not be able to obtain dairy foods essential to good health. Removing that amount of dairy products from the oversupply maintained the prices of such products from 20 to 40 percent above what they would have fallen to in a speculator's market. To reduce the appropriations at this time will invite further difficulties in the dairy markets as the flush season of production comes on. The losses to butter and cheese producers under such conditions will far exceed the amount of the "economy" which this bill proposes. The proposal is unjust to other farmers whose products were purchased in three times the amount expended for dairy commodities. It is still more unjust to the millions of the ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed who have shared in this portion of the farm program. Restoration of the amounts for surplus commodity purchases should be done by amendment. The cost of a battleship exceeds the so-called savings proposed by this reduction, and there is no present indication that battleships are as badly needed as are food for the needy and improved markets for the farmers.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. What does the gentleman estimate to be the yearly cost of our battleship program?

Mr. HULL. The only estimate I could make is on the general information given us when naval matters are before the House, that one modern battleship costs in the neighborhood of $72,000,000.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. If I told the gentleman that the total appropriation for battleships this fiscal year was only around $100,000,000, would that alter the gentleman's statement?

Mr. HULL. Did the gentleman say $1,000,000,000?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. No; I said around $100,000,000.

Mr. HULL. As the appropriation for battleships this year?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The amount appropriated for battleship construction this year is something slightly over $100,000,000, and for the proposed 45,000-ton ships, only something over $100,000,000.

Mr. HULL. It may well be that for some particular type of battleship only $1,000,000 was appropriated for the current year, but there is authorization for battleships running into the hundreds of millions.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Authorizations, but not appropriations.

Mr. HULL. Eventually they will be made, the money is going to be spent. Now, I would withhold a little of what is going to be spent on battleships and give it to the farmer, particularly the dairy farmers of the country.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I am entirely sympathetic with farm relief, but how much of the needed farm relief does the gentleman think the amount appropriated for a battleship would take care of? Certainly only a very small percent.

Mr. HULL. The amount authorized for battleships?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The amount authorized and the amount appropriated are entirely different things.

Mr. HULL. But if the authorization is there it does not matter whether in 1 year there is appropriated $1,000,000,000 or $100,000,000, we may expect the balance to be appropriated.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I wish to deny the inference that farm relief and national defense are conflicting items. They both may be considered as essential to the welfare of the Nation. In the face of world-wide conditions and the lessons of history, it would be folly to cut down our naval defense. Is it claimed that battleships cause a reduction of money available for farm relief?

Mr. HULL. Battleships and other naval craft.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. What is the gentleman's definition of a battleship?

Mr. HULL. Perhaps my definition of a battleship and the gentleman's definition of a battleship may not agree. To my mind any ship of war is a battleship, whether they are huge structures or little ones.

In 1939 the total of farm income was approximately $8,000,000,000. The direct benefits to farmers were about $730,000,000, or approximately 9 percent of the total. The indirect benefits through corn, cotton, and wheat loans and commodity purchases can only be estimated, but probably far exceeded the amount of direct payments.

The farmers, comprising 25 percent of our national population, receive less than 10 percent of our national income. The farm income for 1938 was nearly a billion less than that of 1937. Except for fall advances in the prices for some products in anticipation of the effect of war, the income of millions of farmers was less in 1939 than in 1938. In Wisconsin farm income for 1939 was 13 percent below that of 1938.

At such a time, when farm foreclosures have driven hundreds of thousands of farmers from their homes and farms, and the farmers remaining are receiving so much less than cost of production that further foreclosures are bound to follow, protection of agriculture from the attempts of those who favor balancing the Budget at the expense of farm income should be the duty of Congress, and for my part I shall vote accordingly. In 1937 about 35 percent of our farmers had an average income of less than $500. That year was more favorable to farmers than any since. I am not in favor of still further reducing the income of 2,000,000 farmers by the proposed economies, nor of depriving another 1,500,000 farmers, whose incomes are less than $1,000, of any benefits which may have been derived from the farm program now in force. I am ready and heartily ambitious of seeing policies adopted which will lead to greater benefits and increased incomes. But the matter directly before us is that of protecting what we have while seeking the better. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

PROGRESS OF THE FEDERAL RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PROGRAM

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, one of the outstanding accomplishments of our national agricultural policy of aiding the rural people of the United States to improve their living standards has been the rapid expansion of rural electrification during the past 4½ years. When the Rural Electrification Administration was established in May 1935 only 1 out of every 10 farms was receiving central station electric service. Today 1 farm out of every 4 is receiving the benefits of this service. It is evident that this rapid progress would not have been possible without the encouragement given by the Federal Government through its lending of funds at low rates of interest to rural communities for the construction of their electric distribution systems. The total number of farms now electrified is about 1,700,000. Even with the widespread activity of R. E. A., which has given aid to farmers in 45 States, over 5,000,000 farms are still without central station electric service.

PROGRESS OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

It is reported that on January 1 of this year about 400,000 rural consumers were receiving electric service from lines constructed with funds borrowed from Rural Electrification Administration, and that service will be available to an additional 350,000 when lines now under construction are completed. Progress has been made during the past 6 months at an accelerated pace, as is evidenced by the fact that of the 400,000 now receiving service, about 132,000 were connected between July 1, 1939, and January 1, 1940, an average of 22,000 a month. Since September 1939 it is reported that connections have been made at the rate of about 30,000 rural consumers a month. This compares with an increase of 168,000 between July 1, 1938, and July 1, 1939, or an average of 14,000 per month. By the end of the lending program as established by the Congress in the Rural Electrification Act, service will be available to almost one and one-half million farm families and other rural consumers from R. E. A. financed lines alone.

The growing importance of the rural-electrification program and the accompanying increase in the magnitude of the responsibilities of Rural Electrification Administration are shown clearly by the reports of that agency on its increasing investments of public funds in rural-electric systems. At the end of the year 1939 R. E. A. had made allotments totaling $268,037,000 to 690 borrowers located in 45 States. This compares with $229,698,000 to 632 borrowers on July 1, 1939; $89,565,000 to 367 borrowers on July 1, 1938; $61,148,000 to 266 borrowers on July 1, 1937; and $15,050,000 to 66 borrowers on July 1, 1936.

The records of Rural Electrification Administration showing the amount of funds actually advanced by the Treasury Department for rural electrification and the number of miles of electric line actually constructed are equally impressive in indicating the forward strides of this program. By January 1, 1940, R. E. A. had advanced funds totaling $184,099,000. This figure compares with advances of $122,338,000 on July 1, 1939, $60,500,000 on July 1, 1938, and $12,401,000 on July 1, 1937. From these figures it may be observed that approximately the same amount—$62,000,000—was advanced during the last 6 months of 1939 as was advanced during the entire 12-month period between July 1, 1938, and July 1, 1939, which indicates a doubling of the monthly rate at which funds were going out for labor and materials. A similar rate of progress is revealed by the reports of the number of miles of electric line constructed. These reports show that on January 1, 1940, there had been a total of 200,579 miles constructed; on July 1, 1939, a total of 137,277 miles; on July 1, 1938, a total of 61,460 miles; and on July 1, 1937, a total of 12,462 miles. During November and December of 1939 the rate of construction reached an all-time high, averaging slightly over 500 miles of line a day.

These statistics show clearly the progress that has been made in carrying out the Federal rural-electrification program. It is a notable record of 4½ years' work. Particularly is it noteworthy when consideration is given to the size of the staff that has been responsible for this work. For the present fiscal year Rural Electrification Administration has an appropriation for salaries and expenses of $2,700,000, or about 1 percent of the $268,000,000 of investments for which it is responsible. The Budget estimates for the next fiscal year indicate a similar relationship between the item of salaries and expenses and total investments, which will then amount to approximately $310,000,000. To my knowledge, there is not any other business, either public or private, with similar responsibilities and activities that conducts its affairs more economically and at a smaller percentage of its total loans. It is generally recognized that because R. E. A. investments are made in going concerns, usually to the extent of 100 percent of the value of the properties constructed with the borrowed funds, and because of the highly technical nature of the work involved in the construction and operation of electrical systems, it is necessary that Rural Electrification Administration must have a continuing responsibility with the affairs of its borrowers at least until they have established themselves on a financial basis that gives assurance of repayment of the loans. Undoubtedly most of the progress achieved in carrying out the rural-electrification program reflects the activities of the relatively small but highly competent staff of experts engaged in the work. The inherent nature of these activities requires a large proportion of highly trained technicians and professional persons. A second factor which has contributed in no small measure to the progress has been the employment of the more progressive methods of management.

Through measured standards of performance, scheduling and progress records, a positive control is maintained over operations. It is apparent from a demonstration of these controls that this agency has been able not only to coordinate its activities for maximum effectiveness but also that it has operated very efficiently. A third factor which deserves special notice is the intensity at which the R. E. A. staff works.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PRIOR TO 1935

Prior to 1935 rural electrification generally was restricted to a selected class of farm residents. For the most part, those farmers fortunate enough to have electricity were located along the main roads extending between urban centers, where density of population was relatively high, or in areas of the country where the type of farm activities offered large power loads at the outset. In most rural areas devoted to general farming, however, line extensions usually were short and reached only a few customers located in the more prosperous sections. In addition, rates and other conditions of service were generally restrictive of rural electrification, ranging from requirements that prospective customers pay high prices for the line and give the power company title to the property, to partial contribution to the construction cost with high minimum bills or other extra charges. Generally the private companies made no effort to find out whether construction in rural areas might not be simpler and less expensive than that in urban centers and therefore require less investment. If the companies were disposed to build lines into the country, farmers had to pay whatever the company asked or do without service. Most farmers had to give up the thought of having electricity because their income would not permit acceptance of such terms. Primarily because of these onerous conditions there was very little real rural electrification in the United States before 1935. The practice of making short extensions to the relatively few farmers who could afford to pay meant not only that electric service was restricted but also that construction costs were unduly high because of piecemeal heavy construction.

A NEW APPROACH TO RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

When Rural Electrification Administration was established it was recognized that an entirely new approach to the problem would have to be made if electric service were to be made available on a widespread basis to farmers at rates and under conditions they could afford. At that time it was assumed that under the favorable conditions established and the low-interest rates offered by R. E. A. the existing private utility companies would borrow the majority of the loan funds because they were going concerns, had generating plants and other facilities, and had seemed to indicate their intention of extending service into agricultural areas. It was thought that by making loans to private companies, the funds would be spent promptly for labor and materials and thereby stimulate business immediately and help to alleviate the serious unemployment situation. But of the $268,000,000 allotted by Rural Electrification Administration by January 1, 1940, less than 2 percent has been borrowed by private companies.

Within a year after R. E. A. was established, a new type of borrower—the electric cooperative, or nonprofit local distributing organization—came into being. This development, which had been foreseen in the Rural Electrification Act of 1936, began at a slow pace at first, but grew rapidly as more farm communities discovered how they could organize to get electricity. Under their State laws they formed cooperatives to borrow funds from R. E. A. Of the total amount allotted by January 1, 1940, over 92 percent had been borrowed by cooperative associations and about 6 percent by public power districts and other public bodies.

As has been indicated, in order to make electric service available on a widespread basis to farmers at rates that they could afford to pay, a new approach had to be made on many fronts to remove or overcome the barriers that had stood in the way of progress in the past. This meant blanket coverage of large areas, sharply reduced line costs, and lower rates. It was evident that these objectives had to be achieved if widespread rural electrification on a self-liquidating basis were to be made a reality. These objectives and the emergence of the cooperative organization as the principal type of borrower—a type of organization relatively new to the electric industry in the United States—presented the need of pioneering work of a high order. As a consequence, it has been necessary to obtain the service of competent technicians and other experts in order to deal effectively with these matters.

REDUCTION IN RURAL LINE COSTS

One of the outstanding accomplishments of R. E. A. is the substantial reduction in the cost of line construction. Before the establishment of R. E. A. the reported average cost of rural lines ranged from $1,500 to $1,800 a mile. With few exceptions, rural line construction had followed urban practice of heavy construction. R. E. A. engineers streamlined the established design and produced a graceful but durable style that is more economical and better serves the needs of the farmer. By designing rural lines to meet rural needs, by placing construction on a mass-production basis, and by simplifying and standardizing designs and materials, R. E. A. has reduced line costs to an average of about $800 a mile, or about 50 percent of previously reported costs. Since 1935 the over-all line costs of R. E. A. borrowers have been declining—from $980 in 1936 to $914 in 1937, to $810 in 1938, and to $754 in 1939. These economies have not been achieved by inferior design or construction. R. E. A. line design is being adopted by the private companies. The constant decline in the cost of line construction is broadening the potential area of economical rural electrification because every reduction is reflected in the farmers' electric bills, and lower costs mean that more farmers can afford electric service.

Closely associated with the development of mass production methods of line construction has been the development of comprehensive area coverage. The practice generally followed prior to 1935, of building only to those farms promising relatively large loads and disregarding all other neighboring farms, frequently referred to as "skimming the cream," deprives the large number of remaining farms of the probability of ever receiving electric service, because lines can be extended to them in the future only at high costs. Comprehensive area coverage as practiced by R. E. A. borrowers, however, assures availability of service to most of the farms within a compact area, because mass-production methods of line construction can be used and the lower costs averaged over both large and small consumers.

Though the new type of line-design standards is the best known contribution of R. E. A. to more economical rural construction and has been responsible for much of the progress of this agency in extending rural electrification on a self-liquidating basis, certain other technical advances should be mentioned. Among these are two which should be noted specifically: a cyclometer-type meter and a low-cost transformer. In cooperation with manufacturers the R. E. A. engineers have developed a cyclometer-type meter which permits easy, direct reading and reporting by farmers themselves and thus reduces the cost of meter reading from about 15 cents to 3 cents a month per meter. Over a period of years this meter will save farmers many thousands of dollars.

Among the more recent technical developments of importance in extending rural electric service is a new low-cost, small transformer which will enable farmers of very limited income to have electric lights and small appliances with a minimum bill of about $1 a month. Even at the substantially and progressively lower costs achieved since the Government program began, many low-income farmers have not been able to afford electric service. This new transformer will enable the sharecropper or small tenant farmer, for example, to have electric lights and radio, and a few other small appliances at very low cost. The development of this small transformer is an excellent example of the efforts of R. E. A. to bring electric service within the reach of all farmers regardless of their income status. This is in direct contrast to practices of utility companies of serving only the more prosperous farmers within an area and disregarding all others.

The effect of these and many other engineering advances in rural line construction has been not only to lower substantially the cost of rural lines, which in turn makes possible lower electric rates, but also to make possible the extension of electric service to many rural areas on an economical basis.

LOWER POWER RATES

Substantial progress also has been achieved by R. E. A. in lowering the cost of electricity to farmers by assisting its borrowers to obtain power at lower wholesale rates. Wholesale power costs are the largest item of expense of rural distribution systems and often may mean the difference between failure and success of a project. Inasmuch as most of the generating plants of the country are owned by private companies, the wholesale rates paid by R. E. A. borrowers must be acceptable to these companies. When the Government rural-electrification program started, many companies were reluctant to quote rates; some refused to quote rates at all, and others offered wholesale rates averaging as high as 2½ and 3 cents per kilowatt-hour. In addition the power contracts offered by many of the companies were complex and contained many confusing clauses detrimental to the interests of the borrowers. By constant negotiations with utilities and State public-service commissions, and because of the growing realization by some companies of the desirability of this new load created without expense to them, R. E. A. has been able to reduce the average wholesale charge per kilowatt-hour to about 1.25 cents. In addition to direct benefits to R. E. A. borrowers, an important effect of these reductions in wholesale rates has been further reductions to other classes of wholesale customers of the companies. In many instances rate schedules of private companies have been revised to meet the new conditions created by the growth of rural electric cooperatives.

RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVES

While the emergence of the cooperative or nonprofit association as the principal type of borrower of Government funds for rural electrification has created problems and consequently profoundly influenced the nature of the responsibilities and activities of Rural Electrification Administration, there are beneficial aspects of this development of far-reaching significance. In a very real sense these cooperative and nonprofit associations are community enterprises conducted on the basis of democratic principles. As community enterprises they are controlled by their membership, and every member has one vote. It has been said that the cooperative movement is one of the great educators for a democratic society. Today, when democratic institutions are being sorely tried throughout the world, we in this country are taking positive steps to reinforce and stabilize our institutions for the preservation of our democracy. The development and growth of rural electric cooperatives and other similar nonprofit associations is one step in the march toward a true democratic society in which citizens of a community through their collective efforts can control their affairs.

However, cooperatives are businesses like any other enterprises and must be operated on sound business principles if they are to be efficient and successful. Inasmuch as the rural electric cooperative and nonprofit corporation is a new type of organization, R. E. A. borrowers lack experience not only in the technical field but also in the business management of electric distribution systems. Obviously, Rural Electrification Administration must help these borrowers initially in solving their technical problems and in guiding them toward a financial basis which will assure the repayment of the Government loans. This requires competent experts and technicians trained in many fields, because the construction and operation of an electrical utility system is a highly technical and complex undertaking. These expert services are required particularly to evaluate the soundness of loan applications and the probability of repayment of the loans, to determine the legal validity of the borrowers' organization and all contracts and other documents, to help farmers obtain maximum benefits from the use of electricity in their home and farm activities, and to guide borrowers in the construction and operation of their systems to assure efficient management and safeguard the Government loan.

The activities of R. E. A. are designed, therefore, to bring to almost 700 borrowers the services of varied experts which the borrowers could not independently afford. They are intended to fulfill the objective of the rural-electrification program of the Congress by making electricity available to as many farms as possible at low cost, and at the same time to assure sound construction and efficient operation of the systems and thus the maximum security of the Government's loans. When consideration is given to the innumerable activities involved in the construction and operation of rural electric systems, it is amazing that Rural Electrification Administration with its small staff has been able to achieve the progress it has made during the past 4½ years.

BENEFITS OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PROGRAM TO INDUSTRY

In addition to its direct benefits to farmers, the Federal program of rural electrification has created other widespread social and economic benefits. One of the chief recipients of these benefits has been the electric utility industry. About two-thirds of the R. E. A. financed systems purchase their power at wholesale from private companies. It is estimated that for the 12 months ending June 30, 1939, the R. E. A. cooperatives purchased approximately 75,000,000 kilowatt-hours at a cost of over $1,000,000. During the present fiscal year these purchases are expected to amount to almost $3,000,000. This represents new business for these utility companies—business for which they did not have to incur any selling or development expense and which results in improvement of their load factor.

The rapid strides of the rural-electrification program with the accompanying increase in the number of new rural users of electricity has opened a new market for the manufacturers of line construction materials. As of June 30, 1939, it is estimated that Federal funds used for financing line construction, wiring, and plumbing required manufactured products worth over $145,000,000.

This business was shared by many industries, including lumbering, mining, smelting, electrical manufacturing, hardware, plumbing, and transportation. In addition to the above, consumers on R. E. A. financed lines spent almost $27,000,000 of their own funds for wiring and plumbing installations.

Surveys of the electrical appliances being used by members of R. E. A. cooperatives indicate the extent of the market that has been developed for manufacturers of electrical, household, and farm equipment. On the basis of this survey, it has been estimated that the average farm family, during the first year of electric service, spends almost $200 for electrical appliances. This would indicate that the farmers receiving service from the Government-financed lines have spent not less than $80,000,000 for appliances. Since experts tell us that farmers are just on the threshold of use of electricity in their farm operations, it can be expected that the farm market for appliances and equipment will continue to expand.

THE COOPERATIVE A SOUND INVESTMENT

Inasmuch as not more than 20 percent of R. E. A. borrowers have completed their systems and can be considered to have reached the stage of well-rounded-out going concerns, an appraisal of the operating results to date of the rural-electrification program must necessarily take these conditions into account. The status of the other 80 percent of the borrowers varies widely; some of the systems are not yet energized, while others are constructing additions and are not completely energized. Of those which are energized the average age is about 18 months.

The best evidence of the financial results of the rural-electrification program to date is contained in the figures showing the amounts due the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by the R. E. A. and the amounts which have been collected to meet those payments. The reports indicate that every payment on these obligations has been made promptly and that R. E. A. has had a surplus after each payment was made. On January 1, 1940, a total of $992,362.70 was due the R. F. C. for interest payments. After paying this obligation R. E. A. had a surplus of $1,390,527.15 to its credit for future payments. This is an excellent record of accomplishment.

R. E. A. loans are made on a 25-year basis, and technically—so long as interest is paid—are not due until the end of that period. While R. E. A. has made provision for periodic repayments of principal—a practice not generally followed by private utility companies—it has done so as a matter of good-business practice and not for the purpose of squeezing its borrowers.

At the present stage of the development of the rural-electrification program, trends in borrowers' operations are important indices of the progress being made by them toward financial stability and successful operation of their systems. If gross revenues increase more rapidly than operating expenses, if new users are being added to the lines, and if consumption of power continues to increase, then there is no question of the financial outcome of the program. Judged by criteria such as these, R. E. A. borrowers are in excellent condition and show a promising future. These results, of course, have not been achieved automatically but have come from the continuing efforts of R. E. A. to help borrowers achieve efficient management in the technical and business operation of their electric distribution systems. Such expert advice and counsel must be continued at least until the borrowers have reached a point of stability which assures repayment of the Government loans.

EXPANSION OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

There are strong indications that the desire for electric service by farmers on terms that they can afford to pay is increasing. R. E. A. reports that loan applications on hand or in the field at the present time total about $48,000,000 in the face of discouragement of inquirers when available loans are near exhaustion. This amount exceeds by $8,000,000 the loan appropriation of $40,000,000 recommended in the Budget for fiscal year 1941.

In view of the contention that lack of farm income sets a limit to economical rural electrification, it is of interest to note the results of a survey made by the Farm Journal in 1938. Although made after 2 years of intensified activity in rural electrification, this survey estimated that over 2,000,000 nonelectrified farms were located in the upper income third of the counties of the United States; counties that account for two-thirds of all cash farm income and report an average cash income per farm of $1,733 in 1937.

Rural electrification is one part of our national program to improve farm income and the welfare of farm families. It is a factor common to many parts of the broad program to restore farm life to its proper plane in the national economy, and it reinforces many of the activities being carried on to achieve that objective. In a very real sense, rural electrification is of national concern and its accomplishment is a national responsibility. Notwithstanding the current progress being made in extending electric service to rural areas, the major problem remains primarily one of wider availability, making electric service available to as many farms as possible. The magnitude of the task is challenging when it is considered that 3 out of 4 farms in the United States are still without electric service. The strides and progress already made by R. E. A. indicate that the task can be done.

The Dirksen amendment, which has been accepted by a majority of the Appropriations Committee, is an indirect attempt to destroy the rural electrification program by striking at the patriotic group of men and women who have made it successful.

Before carrying its provisions into effect I do hope that each Member of this House will carefully weigh these pertinent facts.

BASIC POINTS JUSTIFYING R. E. A.'S PROMOTION POLICY

I. Rural electrification was a new thing. It called for pioneering, trail blazing, creation of new techniques.

II. Pioneering requires an unusually high proportion of specialists.

III. R. E. A. did its key recruiting during that part of the depression (1935 and 1936) when first-class men were available at second-class salaries. The salary scale was set too low for present conditions.

IV. R. E. A. grew from some 200 at the end of 1935 to nearly 800 at the end of 1939. Increased responsibilities were constant. Some could be reflected in reclassifications; others only in administrative promotions—when funds permitted. Promotion from within has been a basic policy wherever possible.

V. Each year sees an increase in the total amount of R. E. A. loans, all of which require R. E. A. attention if they are to continue to flow back into the Treasury. In fiscal year 1940, R. E. A.'s administrative appropriation amounts to 1 percent of the amount loaned.

VI. In spite of the promotions made, R. E. A.'s average salary remains substantially below the averages of a number of comparable agencies.

I

R. E. A. is something new—it is a pioneering organization. The engineering and legal problems that have faced R. E. A. since its inception have been new problems calling for new answers.

"How could low-cost, sturdy, and dependable lines be built on a scale never before attempted?" was the question to be answered by the engineers. Engineering skill of unusual caliber was necessary to develop the undeveloped field of rural electrification so that farmers could obtain electricity at a reasonable cost. Men of imagination are not to be found on every corner.

The legal questions concerning State laws in relation to R. E. A. projects were in a new field. Many States lacked suitable laws for the organization of farmer-owned electrification projects. Attorneys had to be of high ability to safeguard the public's money through proper loan contracts, proper incorporations of projects, and proper legal relations of the projects with other interests. Safeguarding the vigor of the borrowing groups from all legal tangles later became an important service. By employing and keeping good attorneys now, difficulties resulting in expenditure of large sums of money will be avoided in the future.

Good accountants to keep track of expenditure and repayment of funds, experts to help develop projects that will be healthy and pay off the loan in the contracted period, experts to help the farmer learn how electricity could be used profitably on the farm—all are necessary in establishing and maintaining an effective program of rural electrification.

II

Rural Electrification Administration's work is highly specialized. The technical nature of the work calls for specialists and skilled people generally. The engineering problems require skilled engineers; the legal problems require trained lawyers; the accounting problems require experienced accountants. Passing on the feasibility of loans in a new field is a difficult art. Helping farmers get acquainted with electricity and put it to work calls for a high order of training and experience in a specialized field. Advising with young projects in the solution of their operating problems is not work for routine clerical personnel.

Since the work is in professional fields, professional salaries have to be paid. Therefore, higher salaries should logically prevail than in agencies where the subject matter is non-professional.

III

In spite of its technical nature, R. E. A. has a low-salary scale. Many of the key employees were recruited during the depression. They were obtained at unusually low salaries. Business is now better. R. E. A. knew it wouldn't be able to keep these people unless higher and more equitable salaries were paid. Losing these men would have been and would now be a blow to the operating effectiveness of the agency and would endanger the security of the money loaned, now totaling some $275,000,000.

Not only from the standpoint of cutting down turn-over is it advisable to pay adequate salaries. Fairness requires that professional and skilled persons, still receiving salaries far below the worth of the job they are performing, be given increases commensurate with their work.

IV

Rural Electrification Administration is growing. It is successfully carrying out the program laid out by Congress. As the organization has grown, jobs have increased in responsibility. The volume of work per man has likewise increased. Higher-quality work and greater quantity both deserve higher compensation. Lapses and savings resulting from increasing efficiency have been applied to this end as fast as they accrue.

As the administrative staff has grown, in attempting to keep pace with the loaning operations, new jobs have developed. These have been filled by promotion from within, which is the cheapest, quickest, and most effective way of getting the work of R. E. A. done. Those already in R. E. A. knew the organization—the nature of the job; they did not have to be trained. On the other hand, the organization knew the ability of the employee. Promotion of able employees was the logical result.

Although the administrative staff has increased in size, the increase in work is out of all proportion. Thousands of hours of overtime are put in by members of the staff to keep up with the current pressure of work. In fact, Mr. Carmody, the former Administrator, found it necessary to forbid unauthorized overtime. The load was telling on the productiveness of many staff members.

V

The total amount loaned to date is $270,000,000. None of the borrowers have completed repayment, nor will they for many years to come—the loans are for 20 to 25 years. R. E. A. has a continuing responsibility for all the outstanding loans. Yet the administrative expenses appropriated for fiscal year 1940 were $2,700,000, which amounts to 1 percent of the money loaned.

Assuming $40,000,000 to be loaned during fiscal year 1941, the total sum being administered will equal $315,000,000. For the administration of this fund, the President's budget calls for $3,100,000, which is under 1 percent of the amount of money loaned. The administrative load increases year by year as additional money is loaned, and will for some time to come, until the older projects become fully going concerns, able to do without load building, management, and accounting assistance, as rapidly as new projects are launched.

VI

According to the United States Budget for 1941, the average salary estimated to be paid in R. E. A. during the current fiscal year is $2,342. Five comparable agencies show average salaries estimated for their departmental staffs—R. E. A. has no field staff—ranging from $2,585 for Farm Credit Administration, to $2,710 for Farm Security Administration. Securities Exchange Commission shows $2,635, Federal Power Commission shows $2,655, and Reconstruction Finance Corporation shows $2,694. These figures are all taken from the Budget now before Congress, and are arrived at by dividing the number of permanent departmental employees into the amount set aside for their salaries.

The Budget of the United States—1941
[Estimate 1940 column]

In fact, the R. E. A. pay roll for January 16–30, 1940, shows $2,334 as the average actually being paid, a drop of $8 per employee under the estimates for the year.

Rural Electrification Administration employees fall into the following categories, reflecting the high proportion of skilled workers, yet revealing that the ratio is not fantastic in any way: 29 experts; 44 attorneys—34 attorneys $3,200 and above, 10 attorneys below $3,200; 156 engineers—132 engineers and 24 trainees—70 engineers $3,200 and above, 86 engineers below $3,200—62 engineers and 24 trainees; 41 classified employees $3,200 and above, 502 classified employees below $3,200.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to inflict myself on the House at this late hour, but this being the last opportunity to get in on general debate, and having one or two items that I want to mention, I feel I have to do so, much as I hate to.

I was disturbed to note that, due to a technicality, it was necessary or will be necessary to eliminate $72,678,812 asked to be appropriated for the extension of the food-stamp plan of disposing of farm surpluses. This plan, it seems to me, is a very constructive one; and just as 2 and 2 makes 4, if the farmers and the Department of Agriculture want to get rid of their surpluses, we must promote and follow a plan such as this, which makes it possible in a practical way to get rid of the surpluses. We have 10,000,000 unemployed and poverty-stricken people in this land of ours begging for food and for relief. We have another 8,000,000 people classed as among the aged, as well as thousands of others physically handicapped, all holding out their hands asking for food. As long as we have these huge farm surpluses, it seems to me just common, ordinary horse sense that we continue this food-stamp plan which has been put into effect during the past 2 years, and which is being used to a very successful degree, not only to supplement scanty food rations but also as to the farmer and retailer. I hope that some way will be found to continue the plan.

The other matter I want to discuss briefly is a real solution for the farm problem. It seems to me that after we put some of these various panaceas into effect, always along comes the opposition to nullify everything we do in the way of raising farm prices. However, there are two things that can be done, if I am not mistaken in my mathematics, which would materially aid the farmer to realize better net prices for produce, and do it permanently. One is the adjustment of freight rates, especially in the Midwest area, where the greatest proportion of our Nation's foodstuffs are produced; and the second is an adjustment of our taxes on real estate.

Taking up the first just briefly, many of you have already often heard me make the statement that we in the Middle West are being discriminated against so far as freight rates are concerned.

I want to quote just two simple figures and facts which you can take home with you tonight and give a little consideration to in connection with this statement. I am informed that it costs only 4 cents to ship a bushel of wheat from Buffalo, N. Y., to New York City, by rail, a distance of 436 miles. From Yankton, S. Dak., it costs the farmer there who puts his bushel of wheat on a freight car 15.9 cents per bushel to haul it to the city of Duluth, a distance of only 424 miles, or 12 miles shorter than from Buffalo to New York City by rail.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Does the gentleman think that the passage of the omnibus transportation bill now in conference will help that situation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the point I make. If you men who have made all sorts of promises and assertions about your desire to assist the farmers and who have spoken about your intense interest in the farmers, want to do something for them, it seems to me you cannot support the "ominous" transportation bill, S. 2009, the consideration of which we are going to be faced with shortly, and which, if passed, would continue and would intensify this unjust and iniquitous freight rate situation so far as the farmers are concerned. Not only that but the Interstate Commerce Commission is even now already and without it lending its support and voice to promotion of this very thing, although they were set up originally to prevent discrimination and to protect the shipper and consumer. If we want to do something to assist the farmers, why do we not get at some of these fundamentals that are taking dollars and cents from the farmers' pockets? In other words, if it costs 16 cents to ship a bushel of grain from Yankton, S. Dak., to Duluth, 424 miles, and it only costs 4 cents to ship that same bushel of grain more miles from Buffalo to New York City, there is something rotten in Denmark, and I think you will all have to admit that.

That is only one illustration. I might give you dozens more, covering not only what the farmer sells but what he buys and consumes, and I know my colleague the gentleman from the great State of Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON], could assist in the presentation of these facts if the time was available.

As regards the other matter, taxes on real estate, I recall in an investigation I made of our tax situation in Minnesota a few years ago that about 85 percent of our tax burden was collected from real estate out there. That probably is about the same proportion as in most of the States of the Union. I will venture to state that today, if the truth were known, our farmers are being asked to pay about double the tax they were 20 years ago. What sense is there in that with farm produce selling for one-half, and even one-third, and, in some cases one-fourth, of what the same produce brought the farmer 20 years ago?

We are about 150 years behind the times when it comes to the question of tax reforms; in other words, we stand today about where we did in the beginning of this Nation, when 90 percent of our people were either living on farms or were engaged in agriculture and allied lines. At that time we put the tax burden rightfully on real estate as the main activity. Even the first President, Washington, was a farmer then. But today, when only approximately 25 percent of our people are gaining their livelihood through agriculture, to continue to load down the farmer and the real-estate owner with this huge burden of taxes is just plain unfairness and lack of sense, it seems to me. If we hope to do anything for the farmers, about whom we talk so much and weep crocodile tears, we must get down to fundamentals. Two problems at least must be attacked more vigorously, and they are the adjustment of freight rates and the removal of the tax burden from the farmer. [Applause.]

Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert the following:

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., January 27, 1940.

Hon. J. G. ALEXANDER,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The subcommittee of four Farm Belt Republican Congressmen met in Minneapolis, December 20, 1939, where and when a searchlight was turned on northwest agriculture and its economic problems. I regret that it was impossible for me to attend that meeting. I am a farmer, half owner and operator of a farm in South Dakota. I was born and grew to manhood on a farm in northern New York State. I know what has hurt the farmers and what they need for recovery. Freight rates must be cut materially and all carrier facilities relieved entirely of their tax-collecting job.

There are three essentials that are costing us farmers more than we can afford to pay, namely: (1) Land on which to work (I own my farm); (2) transportation; and (3) governmental activities. Our greatest expense is freight. That is not only true in respect to farmers; freight is the largest item of overhead paid by everyone. But we (farmers) pay it twice—to and from the farm. The carriers' taxes are included in all freight bills, because railroads are tax collectors, not taxpayers—costly collectors.

Indirect taxes, the innumerable taxes on transportation facilities especially, are the next important cause of our present plight and why we cannot recover our former prosperity. These taxes must be shifted to the income from economic rent, where they cannot affect the price of goods and services that we must buy and sell. This also applies to and affects the entire population, as everybody pays land rent to someone, and it is one of the sources of income that isn't taxed, although it is earned by the population collectively, not by any individual. It should therefore be used as a replacement tax only; take the place of taxes that do harm.

Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange, in a speech at St. Louis on October 17, 1939, said: "The farmer is keenly interested in transportation because it has a vital effect on his pocketbook." Hon. VINCENT P. HARRINGTON, in his speech the day before at the same place, told us what our perplexity was due to. He said: "Cut the high cost of transportation and thus reduce the cost of distribution." There is no other way for legislators to help the farmer. And while they are aiding him (in the right and only way) they will be contributing to "the more abundant life" for everybody else. Freight rates must be cut 50 percent at least, but railroads cannot do that and at the same time collect taxes, nor support the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There are two governmental bodies that should receive the earnest and unprejudiced consideration of the Congress; namely, the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Department of Agriculture. Both cost the farmers and everyone else immense amounts of money yearly, directly and indirectly—mostly the latter. Both should be abolished in the interest of democratic government. Both are superfluous. Neither serve any good purpose for the farmer nor anybody except tax eaters—bureaucrats. The insuperable load of indirect taxes must be shifted from our backs to our common income: Economic rent—land rent—which we have to pay anyhow. Levied there, they can harm nobody and do everybody a lot of good.

Respectfully yours,

C. J. LAVERY.

Communitistic activity, pro and con, appears to be engaging the minds of many who should know that communism, or any other subversive campaign, is not a social disease but is one of the symptoms incident to and caused by governmental bureaucracy and profligacy. The disease is endemic!

Do what we may about subversive trends in America, the Dies investigation or what have you, some will find, and let us hope not too late, that there is no other way to circumvent or destroy subversive rebellion than by repealing governmental restrictions on our trade with each other and with the world. First, we must get our trade with each other, here at home, free from barriers before we attempt adjusting import tariffs.

Mr. Secretary Hull and the President are working on the last end of our problem instead of the first, the home end. Taxes that are now levied on business and industry which, eventually, are paid by the ultimate consumer—indirect taxation—together with other governmental restrictions, are the chief cause of most of our vexations. They should be shifted.

The Congress ought to realize that our desired objective can never be attained by enacting new statutes. But statutes that cause rebellion by raising the price of food, clothing, and shelter must be abrogated or, at least, mitigated. The forty-three-odd millions who cannot pay present prices, must be thought of first. "The welfare of a nation is the welfare of its least fortunate." Congress must "take taxes out of prices."

Shifting taxes from the things that the suffering one-third needs, to the income, actual and potential, from economic rent (land rent) which is not now taxed but which should defray the entire expense of Government, ought to engage the earnest attention of our policy makers, now. If legislators don't start doing so in the immediate future, somewhere and somehow, America will continue on the road, now being traveled so rapidly, which leads inevitably to the confusion and disorder that now obtains in Europe and Asia. How would it be to start doing first things first?

Isn't the pursuit of happiness, like health, a process of production, distribution, and consumption? So! Anything that interferes with that process must be, and is, antisocial and unconstitutional. All taxes that raise prices to consumers are just that.

CHARLES J. LAVERY, M. D.

ABERDEEN, S. DAK., January 20, 1940.

[From the Sioux City Tribune of January 27, 1940]

WOULD ABOLISH I. C. C.

Congressman J. G. ALEXANDER, of Minnesota, has started a drive to abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission. And we think that maybe the Congressman has something there.

In a speech the other day he pointed out that no other industry asks the Government to pay the expense of operating its trade association. "We could save $9,000,000 a year by letting the railroads pay the cost of their trade organization," he said.

ALEXANDER doesn't think much of the efficiency of the Interstate Commerce Commission, anyhow. He thinks the heavy increase in the amount of railroad debt during the last 10 years is a poor testimonial for the Commission.

There should be Government ownership and control or the Government should quit trying to regulate the railroads, ALEXANDER declared. He'd let the high-salaried railroad presidents try running the business themselves.

Considering the hash the I. C. C. has made of the American transportation situation, there is a sound basis for some kind of effort looking to a complete overhauling of the control agency.

The railroads are, as Mr. ALEXANDER points out, still going in the red and service has not been materially improved. Private management could have done no worse than the governmental agency.

Perhaps the Commission should not be abolished but it certainly needs overhauling and shaking up. No department in Washington is so completely bogged down in red tape nor so beset by doddering old men who should be retired from public service.

It should be abolished and the Department of Agriculture also.

C. J. L.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] has just extended his remarks in the RECORD. He widely advertised the fact that he would deliver a speech on the floor of the House today attacking the W. P. A. administration in Pennsylvania, and that such an attack on his part would be in the nature of a bombshell. The gentleman has not seen fit to make his speech; whether because he lacked courage or was not sure of his facts I do not know.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Not just now.

It seems to me the bombshell has turned out to be a squib.

May I also direct the attention of the House to the fact that when the first deficiency W. P. A. bill was considered on this floor last year the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I believe, voted for the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] to recommit the bill and to cut the sum from $725,000,000 to $350,000,000, and on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] to restore the amount to $875,000,000 as recommended by the President and the Works Progress Administrator. The gentleman voted "no." That is the answer to what the gentleman thinks of Federal funds for W. P. A.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McGRANERY. Is it not a fact that the Governor of Pennsylvania has refused to put up $125,000 in order to receive from W. P. A. $1,250,000 for the cleaning up of the upper Schuylkill River?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is correct. The Governor of Pennsylvania has halted that project and refused Federal funds.

I cannot answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT], because he did not make the speech, as he previously informed the press he would do. The gentleman released his remarks to the press but did not utter them on the floor of the House.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT].

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman, may I explain to my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY] that I did not make the speech and extended my remarks in the Record simply to save the time of the Members of the House? May I say further that I and others of my colleagues will be on this floor later and give plenty of opportunity to other Members to interrogate us. As far as talking about bombshells and explosives is concerned, we never did that. We insist that there is a sufficient case against the W. P. A. in our State that it should either be answered satisfactorily or the condition corrected.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am interested in the remark made by the previous speaker that the Governor of Pennsylvania was refusing to put up $125,000 to match a W. P. A. allotment of $1,250,000. That would be a 10-percent sponsor's contribution. My understanding is that the contribution is expected to be at least 25 percent.

Mr. BRADLEY and Mr. McGRANERY of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. CORBETT. May I say to all of you, because I have only a few seconds left, that there will be ample opportunity to go over all these questions. However, on this particular issue, I refuse to get into a partisan controversy. It is a simple case of whether or not the State is getting ample W. P. A. funds, or whether it is not.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman agrees he did not make that speech on the floor of the House for us to answer. I want the press to note that.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, of course, we all know that in an appropriation bill the only thing that can be done in behalf of the farmer is to appropriate money authorized by Congress. Everyone knows that we cannot legislate in an appropriation bill. I do not think in this bill the committee has carried out the will of Congress. It is very unfortunate that we began the consideration of the bill before a copy of it, together with the report and hearings, was furnished by the Appropriations Committee to Members of the House. It is almost impossible for those who are not members of the Appropriations Committee to familiarize themselves with every detail of an item of appropriation in the bill. Many Members have complained of this, and I sincerely hope that all committees from now on handling such important bills will see the justice in reporting the respective bills, together with reports and hearings, at least 3 days before the bill comes up for consideration in the House.

I believe in economy and I would like to see the Budget balanced as soon as possible but not entirely at the expense of the helpless and distressed farmer.

We have appropriated for agricultural purposes for the present fiscal year $1,200,000,000 and this bill reduces the amount for the next fiscal year to approximately $625,000,000, a reduction of nearly 50 percent.

I certainly hope many items in the bill will be increased before it is passed.

Why should the committee cut out entirely the appropriation for the farm-purchase program, a relief program which is shown to be self-supporting and not costing the Government anything. This is an attempt to destroy a program to aid the farm-tenant population of our country.

Why should the committee make such a drastic cut in the appropriation for the soil conservation districts. This agency is perhaps doing more permanent and constructive work on less money than any other agency. The main purpose of this agency is the preservation and improvement of soil fertility which in the end will stabilize and help maintain the farmers' purchasing power.

There are many items in this bill beneficial to the farmers which should not be cut so drastically.

Farmers, especially the cotton grower, have been neglected more than any other class for the past half century, and now in this bill you are seeking to cut their benefits lower than any other class.

The prosperity of practically every business is dependent on agricultural prosperity, for the reason that half of the people of the United States are dependent directly or indirectly on agriculture for a living. The farmer with more purchasing power can buy more industrial products and industry can pay more wages to employees who can buy more food and clothing.

The farmer is forced, and has been for many years, to sell his product in a competitive market and to buy his absolute necessities in a protected market. Everything he buys he pays a fixed price for it, which includes cost of production and a reasonable profit, and when the cotton farmer sells he has to take the other fellow's price for his commodities and pay his price for the necessities he, the farmer, needs. The cotton farmers cannot suffer any longer the disparity existing between the price they received for their commodities and the price they pay for the actual needs of life.

The average gross income of the cotton farmer of the South is less than $200 per year, and if he is a tenant or cropper part of this amount must go to the landlord who is burdened with payment of large sums for taxes and upkeep of the land. Besides, he has to pay out a considerable amount of the gross income for fertilizer, bollweevil poison, farm implements, and so forth. How can an average family—of five persons—live on this amount? The poorest-paid person in any walk of life receives twice as much for his labor. The garbage cleaners are receiving far more for their services than the industrious cotton farmers who are doing their best to remain on the farm and stay off the relief roll. About 30 percent of our entire population is engaged in farming and my information is that they receive less than 10 percent of the national income. No wonder that thousands and thousands of our people are leaving the farms daily and entering the relief rolls to obtain a livelihood and work in industries where they are protected by wage and hour laws.

Many of these people prefer to remain in rural sections where home life and environment are much more preferable to that of the city. If these people continue to abandon the farms for the next few years as they have in the past, we will soon not have enough farmers to produce the actual necessities for the people of this country. I believe if you Members from the cities understood the real plight of the cotton farmers of the South and the grain growers of the West as we Members of the rural sections know it, you would assist us in obtaining at least parity for the basic commodities of these farmers. Besides correcting an injustice in great sections of this country, it would lessen the tax burden of your constituents. These people will go back to the farms where they were reared, cultivate the soil dear to them, where living expenses are not so costly, produce some of the food crops, and, with an equitable and just price for their money crops, live in contentment and in a measure enjoy prosperity.

I am not satisfied with farm measures and the benefits thereunder to the cotton farmers. While these laws have been helpful to an extent, the benefits are far short of justice and parity. The farmers of my section of the country do not oppose good prices for commodities produced in our sections, but they want, and are entitled to, parity and living prices for their commodities.

I believe in national defense and favor adequate appropriations for same, but it is just as important and necessary to protect the farmers and their children, and if we are to have increase in appropriation for armaments, why is it not just as important to have increase in appropriation for the distressed farmer. Anything that weakens agriculture will necessarily weaken our national defense. Agricultural prosperity is essential to a strong national defense.

Every tariff act upon the statute books for years works to the disadvantage of the farmer, and the author of the first tariff act recognized that something should be done to help the farmer to offset the tariff.

The tariff measures were passed to protect industry of this country, and therefore the duties collected on imports should be paid to the farmers who are under a disadvantage by these acts, and certainly all customs receipts on imports to this country should be paid the farmers producing basic commodities, such as cotton and wheat, they being the farmers suffering so much under disparity. Therefore, I advocate and I am one of those demanding that all amounts derived from customs receipts, which approximate $400,000,000 annually, be paid to these farmers and thus in a great measure help bring about parity.

The farmer wants something certain and definite that he can count on each year. The question continually arises: Where will we obtain the money to pay benefits to farmers? If the amount derived from customs receipts is made permanent and paid annually to the farmers, this certainly will be helpful in bringing about parity and the farmer will know he can count on this sum at least. Much dissatisfaction is caused by not knowing, when they plant their crops, what they will receive in the way of benefits.

The farmers producing surplus crops, such as cotton, and selling in a free market and assuming the burden of tariff-laden articles, are entitled to bounties to offset the tariff as a matter of justice.

I think that every Member in this House, regardless of whether he is in favor of a high or low tariff, realizes the justice of the position we Members residing in the rural sections now take, and therefore I beg you to assist us in this fight to obtain sufficient bounties equivalent to parity for these farmers.

Parity payment is a means of bringing about a balance in our national structure and should not be called a subsidy.

It was shown at the hearings on this bill that every dollar of increase in cash farm income is accompanied by an increase of from $6 to $7 in national income and that full parity to American agriculture and the restoration of economic balance between agriculture and industry and labor would be very helpful in solving the unemployment problem and giving us permanent prosperity.

It was shown, according to a study made by the Department of Agriculture, that one-third of all factory employees who lost their jobs in 1930 lost them as a result of decreased farm purchasing power, and that in 1933 two out of every five who obtained work owed their new jobs to improvement in farm income.

The cost of the tariff is the main cause of disparity of agriculture. It was shown at the hearings that in a recent estimate of the United States Department of Agriculture the cost of tariff on products consumed by farmers in 1935 amounted to approximately $681,000,000. This, you will see, is a large amount.

The cotton growers in my section of the country cannot go on without more benefit payments at the present price of cotton, especially in view of the reduced acreage allotment. We must have parity prices at least on cotton consumed in this country. Today parity on cotton is a little more than 16 cents per pound, and I beg you Members from other sections of the country to help us to obtain more benefits before it is too late.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE].

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that, in common, I believe, with every Member of Congress who represents agricultural regions, I feel a distinct disappointment in the action of the committee in trimming down on appropriations for the farming class of people in the United States. Practically all items of appropriations heretofore made have been trimmed, and severely trimmed.

The matter of a farm-tenancy purchase program was what we in the rural regions were led to believe was a permanent policy of the Government. In the first year of the existence of the law $10,000,000 was appropriated for the purpose of enabling tenants to purchase homes with Government assistance; $25,000,000 in appropriations were made for this purpose for the second year under the law, with a promise to appropriate $50,000,000 per year thereafter. If I remember correctly, in 1939 the House appropriated $40,000,000 after having raised the amount recommended by the committee from $25,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on this great program. Now the bill has been pared down by the committee to $25,000,000. Of course, $25,000,000 is quite a sum of money to be appropriated to any purpose, but I cannot conceive of any appropriation that could be made by the Congress that would inure more to the general welfare of the country than an appropriation to make home owners out of tenants.

In all, we have appropriated since the law was enacted about $75,000,000 for this unquestionably sane and safe legislation, for the Government up to date has been reimbursed for every dollar that it has put out for the purpose of enabling the tenant farmers of the country to secure homes. While we have appropriated this sum of $75,000,000 for the purpose of enabling tenants to own their own homes, we have gone into the cities of the country and appropriated $800,000,000 to the work of city slum clearance. There is no disputing the fact that this clearance of the slums in the cities is a work perhaps as fine in all its purposes and intents as the program to make it possible for tenants to own homes in the country. But there is quite a bit of difference between the $75,000,000 made available for loans to tenant farmers and $800,000,000 made available to the uses of those people in the cities who have not comfortable and sanitary places in which to live. Now, the committee has recommended that the entire program for loans to tenant farmers for home purchases be eliminated.

In addition to this item, another one of immense importance not only to the individual farmers throughout the country but to every man engaged in business in America has been recommended for reduction. The committee has recommended a great reduction in the appropriation to prevent soil erosion. Whether a man lives in the city or in the country, he is directly interested in soil conservation and he is a beneficiary of conserving the soil of the country; for if the farmer is able to make more on his farm by keeping the fertility of its soil unimpaired by floods, freshets, and overflows, there is going to be that much more farm products produced, and these farm products are distributed throughout the Nation, and wherever they are taken for use and consumption there is bound to be a corresponding increase in business to the handlers of such products. The cut on this program was not so severe as the one on the farm tenancy purchase program. However, the appropriation heretofore made for the Soil Conservation Service was $24,000,000, and $4,000,000 was taken from this amount just simply because the committee recommended it.

There is a mania abroad for what is erroneously called economy. It is not economical in any sense of the word to cut such an important item as soil conservation $4,000,000 a year. In fact, if there is any justification for an increase in any service of the country, it is in the service of conserving the soil for us who are now here and those who are to come after us.

Another thing to which I wish to call attention is the fact that the committee blindly and without any apparent reason for it, has practically eliminated any appropriation for carrying out its promise to the farmers of the United States to make parity payments to them for adhering to the program of the Agricultural Department in making so-called parity payments to farmers who did comply with the planting and production requirements under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. We should not have promised these farmers throughout the country that they were going to get these parity payments unless we intended to carry out that agreement. At most, under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the farmer can get up to 75 percent of the parity cost of his farm products, and now this is denied him. During the debate much was made of the fact that prices for farm products have gone up and that perhaps as long as the war lasts there would really be no necessity for appropriating any money for parity payments. The committeemen who thus prophesied have reckoned wrong because those prices have begun to tumble, and really more money would be required to make these parity payments under the market as it seems to be heading now for the year ending June 30, 1941, than was appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940. But notwithstanding that, the committee has recommended that appropriations for this purpose be completely eliminated. The appropriation is approximately $550,000,000 less than the appropriation for the current year and about $130,000,000 less than the Budget estimate for this item.

I am constrained to believe that a great deal of the cutting and slashing in these farm appropriations is due to the method in which the appropriations bill has been brought to this House. We adjourn to meet at noon of a certain date, and when we take our seats, if they are available, the pages will hand us the appropriations bill with a volume of probably a thousand pages of closely printed hearings that have been had on the bill. We have no time to study the bill; we have no time even to begin to read the evidence that has been taken on the bill, and the committee expects us to just sit and vote with them on any kind of a cut that they desire to make.

It is generally accepted to be true that pay rolls in factories and indexes to all kinds of businesses follow very closely the increase in farm income throughout the country. If the farm income is above the average, business is above the average. Business not only of the wholesalers and retailers but the factory output is correspondingly large. Then why in the name of ordinary common business sense, should the farmer be denied an appropriation at least commensurate with what has heretofore been appropriated for similar purposes? The committee seems to forget that it would make no difference how many millions of dollars might be appropriated for the purpose of making parity payments, not one dime of it could be used for the purpose of making parity payments unless farm prices had been hammered down, whether due to the wars in Europe and Asia, or to any other cause, to a point below 75 percent of the parity price of such farm products.

What has been said in regard to parity payments, and soil conservation, and farm-tenancy purchases, may be said with equal force as to other agricultural appropriations which have been cut and practically dispensed with at the whim of the committee. It is just another instance, in my judgment, where the farmer has been discriminated against because of the fact that he has no organized force or organization in Washington that is looking after his interests. If he had articulate representation in Washington that was not afraid to stand up and assert itself, he would fare better than he does now, and no committee would dare cut appropriations that have been assured him without any excuse whatever for doing so. It will be observed that when it comes to making appropriations for the Army and Navy, and for slum clearance, that there is very little, if any, reference to the demands of the economy group to cut down appropriations.

The only hope for restoration of any of these items lies in the Senate, and I hope that they will be restored to at least something approaching fairness to the farmer.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] a member of the committee.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, at this late hour of the day I hesitate to take up the time of the Committee, but I do want to say a few things in regard to the bill the Committee on Appropriations is bringing before you now for your action.

There has been a great deal of criticism because of the huge cuts that have been made by the Appropriations Committee in the Budget items and also as compared with the appropriations for last year. The total direct appropriation in the bill this year is $651,000,000, which is $533,000,000 less than the appropriation for the current year and $129,000,000 less than the Budget.

When this bill was taken up by the full committee on yesterday it deducted $25,000,000 which was recommended by the Budget and included in the bill reported by the subcommittee. I should like to discuss fully the subject of the merits of this item under the farm-purchase program but time does not permit.

This House and the Congress several years ago thoroughly debated the merits of a farm tenancy purchase program, and they passed a bill which provided for installments of $10,000,000 for the first year and $25,000,000, I believe, for the second year, and installments of $50,000,000 annually thereafter. The Congress passed the $10,000,000 appropriation over the objection of a great many Members, and last year the House approved $25,000,000 and that was raised $15,000,000 in the conference committee, making available $40,000,000 for that program. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that for the Appropriations Committee to strike from this bill $25,000,000 for this item after about a 3-minute debate by some members of the full committee is absurd, and I hope the House will restore this item of $25,000,000 before the bill is finished.

In addition to this item of $25,000,000 we had an item, which was approved by the Budget, of $72,678,812 for the disposal of surplus commodities. The subcommittee was in favor of keeping this item in the bill, but it went out on a point of order because the appropriation was not authorized by legislation. A great many of the Members of the House who have spoken today have criticized the Appropriations Committee for eliminating this item, and I want the Members of the House to know that it was not eliminated on account of any desire on the part of the committee but by reason of the fact that there was no legislation to support it. I hope this item will be placed back in the bill when it goes to another body, and I feel sure that when it comes back to this House, the membership of the House will sustain the action of the other body.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield.

Mr. PACE. If the gentleman is permitted to state, was the item left out on a point of order or was it left out because the committee thought someone might make a point of order or that it was subject to a point of order?

Mr. TERRY. It was left out because they said there was no legislation for the item. It seems to me it would have been more appropriate for the subcommittee to have put it in the bill and brought it to the full committee, and then let the full committee pass it on to the House, to raise a point of order if some member of the Committee of the Whole wished to raise the point. I would have preferred that procedure.

Mr. PACE. In other words, as the matter is handled now, the House must admit that it is not able to make provision for surplus commodities and must await action by the Senate.

Mr. TERRY. It simply means that under the parliamentary rules of the House, without legislation authorizing it, the House could not put it in the bill, but this parliamentary rule seems not to apply in the Senate.

Another item that was reduced was in connection with the matter of land acquisition under the Forest Service. Last year the committee put in $3,000,000 for land acquisition. The Budget reduced that this year to $1,000,000, and the subcommittee carried out the wishes of the Budget; but it seems to me the program should have been raised at least up to the $3,000,000 which we had last year. The Forest Service has been asking for an annual appropriation of $10,000,000 for this very meritorious program. We did let them have $10,000,000 one year, as I recall, and then it was cut down to $3,000,000. The Forest Service has gauged its personnel to take care of a $3,000,000 annual purchase of land, and it is very necessary in order to carry out the continuity of the program to set a definite amount and carry that amount in the bill every year. It seems to me to reduce that appropriation to $1,000,000 this year will wreck the program, and it seems to me this action was entirely uncalled for.

Another item which seems to me very important in connection with the agricultural program is the soil-conservation program. One of these items is for soil and moisture conservation. Under this program the States of the Nation have passed legislation for the creation of soil-erosion districts. Thirty-six States have passed legislation to this effect, and all over the country the people recognize the value of this work, and the farmers of the country are demanding the formation of these districts, and more and more districts are being created, and yet this year we cut that program down $1,500,000. I would like to see that item restored in the bill.

In the matter of parity payments, there has been criticism of the committee because it did not include in the bill this year parity payments.

The full Committee on Appropriations passed a resolution which provided that the subcommittees could not bring to the full committee a bill which provided for more than the total of the various Budget items of the bill. Under the resolution of the full committee the subcommittee could not bring to the full committee the $225,000,000 parity-payment item. We had that fight on the floor in the past 2 years, and we put that item in the bill. It does not seem to me that there is any reason why the Congress should not carry out the provision which is made for the benefit of agriculture and put this parity-payment item in the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. TERRY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it the gentleman's understanding that section 303 of the Farm Act of 1938 mandates the Congress to provide funds for parity?

Mr. TERRY. It gives authority to do it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does it not say "if and when the Congress appropriates that money it shall be available for parity payments"?

Mr. TERRY. I think it gives them authority to make payments. Certainly for us to quibble over an item of $225,000,000 for one-third of the population of this country, it seems to me, is absurd. When we spend millions and millions of dollars for other items in the national economy, to cut this out and refuse to endeavor to bring approximate parity to agricultural income is entirely wrong.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman realizes that he had an hour, and I only have a few minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will give the gentleman an additional minute. In view of the President's observation about ill-fed, ill-housed, and ill-clothed people, why did he not insert it in the Budget before it came to us?

Mr. TERRY. I do not know why he did not, but I think it would have been splendid if he had inserted it in the Budget.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that for this House to cut the agricultural budget in the way it has been cut is wrong, and that we should endeavor, to the best of our ability, to restore the essential and meritorious items that have been authorized and approved.

Now we hear a great deal about national defense. It is very easy to have budget items brought here for any amount of money for national defense. We are bringing in here an authorization for the Navy, which is supposed to be the equal of any four of the navies of the world. We do not seem to have much difficulty in passing legislation and appropriations for national defense; yet it seems to me that the agricultural program of this country is just as vital and just as essential as the national-defense program. I do not see how we can go on from year to year without adjusting the balance between agriculture and industry and manufacture. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, as a new member of this committee, I want to subscribe to the suggestion made here today that in the future the House have a rule whereby appropriation bills may be reported and submitted to the House at least 2 or 3 days before consideration. We now have before us a bill in which practically every Member of this House is vitally interested. It carries with it a billion dollars or more, yet we have not had the time since it was reported by the committee to give it any study or any consideration whatsoever. Therefore, justifications for the various items can be made intelligently only by members of the subcommittee who heard the testimony justifying the appropriations, and ordinarily criticisms can be made only after a careful study of the testimony; that is, if a criticism is to be valid, just, and fair, the individual making it ought to be able to refer to evidence in justification for it. Therefore, I am going to subscribe to the suggestion made that in the future appropriation bills should be submitted to the House so that all Members of the House may have an opportunity to read the testimony and read the reports 3 days before such bills shall be taken up for consideration or passage.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. HARE. With pleasure.

Mr. DIRKSEN. On the 4th of January the President submitted his Budget message. It contains all of the departmental bills, all the language, all the estimates, and the only difference between this bill and those estimates is in the amounts that have been reduced by the subcommittee and the full committee. So that there has been at least a month in which Members of the House could fortify themselves as far as the basic pattern of this bill is concerned.

Mr. HARE. That is true. There is no argument there, but the point I am making is that we have a bill here where the estimates have been materially changed by the subcommittee, and nobody but members of the subcommittee know the reasons or grounds for such changes. I have every confidence in the integrity and ability of the members of the subcommittee and I am quite sure they always act fairly and in light of the evidence before them, but other Members of the House have equal responsibility in making appropriations, and they are entitled to know, before they are called upon to act, the real grounds or justifications for every appropriation.

Mr. SOUTH. Attention should also be called to the fact that no Member of this Congress has any way of knowing in advance what a subcommittee is going to cut out, that it is going to cut out entire items, as they did the farm-parity payments.

Mr. HARE. That is true. Exactly the point I am trying to emphasize.

Mr. SOUTH. It is a very poor answer to say that we knew in a general way what the President wanted. Neither the President nor God Almighty knows what this committee is going to do.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman is again correct.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield while we are on this subject?

Mr. HARE. I shall be very glad to yield to our majority leader.

Mr. RAYBURN. This question came up at the beginning of the last session of Congress. Some Members were advocating an amendment to the rules providing that a bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations should lie over 48 hours. I told them that if they would not make that move I would like to try to work out something with the Appropriations Committee. The Appropriations Committee agreed to it and did let their bills lie over 48 hours, but later in the session these same men who had made that move came to me and said they cared no further about the operation of that plan, and it was abandoned the latter part of last session.

Mr. HARE. It may be that with longer experience on the committee and with increased knowledge and wisdom I may subscribe to the idea or suggestion made by our able majority leader, but at present I cannot help but feel the suggested policy would be a good one to inaugurate.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not taking one side or the other; I am only saying that it was done at the beginning of last session.

Mr. HARE. I am only suggesting a program which in my judgment will make the appropriations register the best judgment of the whole Congress. I might submit also for consideration of the subcommittees the idea of filing their reports with the full committee at least 24 hours before action is expected by the full committee, because I have to admit that when a full committee has only a few minutes in which to discuss a report filed by a subcommittee based on over 1,300 pages of testimony, as in the case now before us, the full committee cannot act with that degree of wisdom, information, and intelligence that it should. I feel from the experience I have had on the subcommittees on which it has been my privilege and honor to serve that if they report a bill to the full committee for action just a few minutes before the full committee is required to act, the full committee cannot be fully advised as to the testimony or the real reasons for changes made by the subcommittee. However, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to lecture the Members of Congress, but only to give expression to my individual feelings and observations with regard to the existing practice. I arose primarily for another purpose.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I thoroughly endorse everything the gentleman has said, because a man sitting on the outside has not a chance in the world to know anything about it.

Mr. HARE. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. This question comes up once in a while, usually as the result of some item in which some Member is particularly interested; but Members are never taken by surprise; Members are always amply informed. The complete hearings on this bill have been available to any Member of the House.

Mr. KELLER. How long?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Since Monday. Furthermore, this bill runs in well-defined grooves. An item in which any gentleman may be interested was in the bill last year, it was in the bill year before last, and the year before that; it will be in the bill next year and the year after next with absolutely no difference except in the amount. Any Member with any interest at all in any item in the bill can get the hearings and all the evidence at the command of the committee. He knows just what the situation is, and he has ample notice that there is always a possibility that it may be raised or lowered. And, as to the final form of the bill, no member of the committee has more than 30 minutes advice of the action of the Whole Committee over any other Member of the House.

Mr. HARE. As I stated, Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to criticize but only to suggest. This suggestion grew out of my own experience and my own observation as a new member of this committee. My real purpose in rising at this time was to discuss a matter not directly involved in this particular bill, but indirectly involved.

Last year when the Congress had Secretary Wallace's cotton export subsidy plan under consideration, I was not able to subscribe to the theory in toto. It was finally decided that part of the plan would be approved and tried as an experiment. About 2 months ago I observed a criticism of this plan in one of the New York papers, and, in support of this criticism, the author referred to the fact that we were exporting raw cotton to Japan under this plan, and Japan was able to export to the United States the finished product in competition with our manufacturers and our labor.

The criticism on its face appeared to me to have merit, because I am not unmindful of the fact that 90 or 95 percent of my constituents are directly or indirectly interested in the growing or manufacture of cotton, and I have always been interested to see that no governmental policy or program is inaugurated and maintained that adversely affects my constituents. Therefore, I addressed a communication to the Secretary of Agriculture asking to be advised whether or not there was any justification for this criticism. I also addressed a communication to the Assistant Secretary of State asking to be advised if the operation of our reciprocal-trade policy had any effect upon the increased importation of cotton goods from Japan.

The illustration given in support of the criticism referred to was that in the month of September Japan had shipped to the United States 8,000,000 square yards of bleached cotton cloth and in the month of October it had shipped 9,000,000 square yards of bleached cotton cloth, leaving the impression that as a result of the cotton-export plan importations were increasing from Japan alone in this particular item at the rate of a million square yards per month. If this were actually true, there is no doubt but what it would command the attention and consideration of those who are interested in this matter, especially in view of the pending treaty with Japan, where every precaution should be taken to protect the interests of our own people.

Mr. Chairman, without having to take the time to read the replies to my two inquiries, I will ask unanimous consent to have the letter from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Assistant Secretary of State inserted in my remarks at this place.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, December 22, 1939.

HON. BUTLER B. HARE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HARE: This is in reply to your letter of December 12 concerning the effect of the cotton-export plan upon Japanese competition with American mills.

The program provides export payments on cotton products based on cotton content which are equal to the payments for export of raw cotton. Hence American mills have been at no disadvantage in competing in foreign markets as a result of the program. Furthermore, as export payments on raw cotton have been reduced in recent weeks, payments on cotton goods have been maintained at relatively higher levels than those for raw cotton.

This gives American millers a definite advantage. Actual exports of cotton goods, together with sales registered for forward shipment now total over twice the amount exported during all the past cotton year. It would seem very clear that the export subsidy plan has been to the advantage of cotton textile mills as well as their workers.

If there is any other information you desire on the cotton program I shall be happy to provide it.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 14, 1939.

The Honorable BUTLER B. HARE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HARE: I have received your letter of December 12, 1939, in which you refer to a complaint against the reciprocal trade agreements program. You ask whether imports of Japanese bleached goods, which increased in October of this year as compared with September, are really competitive with American cotton goods and whether there has been any increase in such competition under the trade-agreements program.

I enclose for your convenience a table showing imports of cotton cloth from Japan, by months, for the years 1935 through the first 10 months of 1939.

Source: Compiled by the U. S. Tariff Commission from official statistics of the U. S. Department of Commerce.

Although it is true that imports of bleached cotton cloth from Japan increased slightly, from 8,841,345 square yards in September to 9,112,746 square yards in October, and that imports in each of these months were considerably larger than imports during any of the previous months of the year, the explanation for this increase is not to be found in any concessions granted in trade agreements.

Two moderate adjustments in the duties on certain fine, lightweight cotton cloths (mostly permanent-finish organdy and dotted Swiss) were made in the trade agreement with Switzerland, effective February 15, 1936, and a number of moderate adjustments in duty on various other types of cotton cloth were included in the trade agreement with the United Kingdom, effective January 1, 1939. But imports of cotton cloth from Japan are of such type and value that these duty adjustments in the agreements with Switzerland and the United Kingdom do not apply to the Japanese products. For the most part, therefore, imports of cotton cloth from Japan enter at the full rates of duty specified in the Tariff Act of 1930.

Imports of cotton cloth from Japan are relatively insignificant as compared with domestic production. In 1937, for example, when such imports were very considerably higher during the first 10 months of the year than during the first 10 months of 1939, the value of imports of cotton cloth from Japan amounted to only 0.6 percent of domestic woven-goods production. Imports of cotton cloth from all countries in 1937 amounted to only 1.4 percent of domestic production.

As you probably know, under an arrangement between representatives of the American and Japanese cotton textile industries, exports of cotton goods from Japan to the United States are restricted to a maximum of 200,000,000 square yards for the 2-year period 1939-40. Although a similar arrangement was in effect during 1937 and 1938, when the quota for the 2-year period was 255,000,000 square yards, less than 150,000,000 square yards were imported in those 2 years. Imports of cotton cloth from Japan during the first 10 months of 1939 amounted to about 58,000,000 square yards, or only a little more than half of the quota allotment for the year.

The real explanation for the increase in imports of cotton cloth from Japan in September and October of this year is the recent improvement in economic conditions in the country, an improvement which has also been reflected by increased activity in the domestic cotton textile industry. Statistics clearly show that imports and exports are high when domestic economic activity is prosperous, and that they fall in time of depression in the domestic economy. For example, in 1929 imports into this country were valued at approximately four and one-half billion dollars; the index number for production of manufactures (based on 1923-25 as 100) stood at 119; the employment index, at 106; the pay-roll index, at 110. The cash income of American farmers for that year was over $10,000,000,000. In 1932 this huge value of imports had fallen to one and one-third billion dollars. While merchandise imports thus fell off, the index of production dropped to 63; employment, to 66; and pay rolls, to 47. Farm income fell to less than four and one-half billion dollars. Since 1933 our imports and exports have increased concurrently with rising production, increased employment, higher pay rolls, and larger farm income.

As indicated above, the recent improvement in economic conditions in the United States has been accompanied by increased activity in the domestic textile industry. Although imports of cotton textiles were somewhat larger in October, cotton consumed in the United States in October totaled 686,936 bales, compared with 624,902 bales in September, and 543,857 bales in October 1938. The number of cotton spindles active in October 1939 was 22,658,994, compared with 22,231,976 in the previous month and 22,113,316 in October last year.

Exports of raw cotton and cotton cloth from the United States are also increasing. Exports of raw cotton rose to 886,000 bales in October 1939 compared with 649,057 bales in September and only 464,439 bales in October last year. While exports of raw cotton do not directly benefit American cotton-cloth manufacturers, the dependence of our cotton growers on export markets is so great of course that without prosperous export sales the cotton growers do not have the purchasing power to buy the many products of American industry, such as textile products, which they need.

Cotton-cloth exports rose in October of this year to 39,000,000 square yards from 28,000,000 in September 1939 and 26,000,000 in October last year. For the 10 months ending October 1939, exports totaled 271,000,000 square yards, compared with 240,000,000 for the 10 months ending October 1938. As shown in the table, exports in the first 10 months of this year were more than three times greater than total imports of all kinds of cotton cloth from all countries in the same period.

For these reasons, it would be extremely short-sighted for American cotton manufacturers to advocate import restrictions on their products, as such restrictions invariably tend to cause the imposition of counterrestrictions and retaliations by other countries and the consequent restriction of our export trade. This is what happened after the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930.

The trade-agreements program has sought to alleviate excessive trade restrictions and to remove discriminatory trade practices which blocked the channels of world trade and reduced American exports by more than half during the depression years. Under this program, the American cotton manufacturing industry has benefited not only from the increase in our foreign trade, which the agreements have helped to bring about, and the stimulating effect of this increase on domestic agricultural and industrial production, but also cotton textile factory owners and workers have benefited directly as a result of trade-agreement concessions obtained from 11 foreign countries on cotton textiles and their products. Six countries reduced their duties and 3 countries gave assurances that their duties on cotton textiles and manufactures would not be increased. In addition 1 country increased its quota and 1 assured the continuance of the existing quota on cotton manufactures.

In view of these facts, it seems clear to me that the trade-agreements program is fundamentally in the interest of the cotton manufacturers of this country, for it has tended to improve their domestic market, by stimulating domestic business activity and consumer purchasing power, and it has helped and is helping to restore their export markets by reducing trade barriers and preventing discriminations.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE S. MESSERSMITH,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I find from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture that, instead of the subsidy or export plan operating to the injury of the manufacturer, the Secretary claims and insists it is operating to his advantage, because he suggests in his letter the subsidy applies just as well or just as much to the finished product as it does to the raw material; therefore, our manufacturers, as he indicates, are able to dispose of their surplus or their increased manufactured products in foreign markets, and in that way they are able to run or operate more machinery, more spindles, and afford greater opportunity for employment. The Secretary says that the policy—

Gives the American miller a definite advantage. The actual exports of cotton goods, together with sales registered for foreign shipment now total over twice the amount exported during all of the past cotton year. It would seem clear that the export subsidy plan has been to the advantage of the textile mills as well as their workers.

Mr. PACE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman understands it would be very difficult to run that export subsidy program with the $72,000,000 of surplus commodity money knocked out of the bill by the Committee?

Mr. HARE. That goes back to the point I endeavored to make at the beginning of my remarks.

How many Members of the House know from the evidence submitted to the subcommittee whether this item should be eliminated or restored? It may be that this item should be restored, but I want to first read the evidence justifying action of the subcommittee. I certainly hope there will be some way to insert an amount for parity payments that were left out by the Budget Bureau.

It is true, according to figures submitted to me by the Assistant Secretary of State, that there has been a slight increase in the importations of bleached cotton goods from Japan this past year, but instead of being a million square yards in 1 month it was only 271,000 square yards.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I find further upon consulting the figures submitted by the Assistant Secretary of State that instead of there being an increase in the importations of bleached cotton from Japan last year there was an actual decrease if we take the first 10 months of the year and compare them with the first 10 months of the past 3 years. Take the figures we have already submitted for the first 10 months of the past 3 years and we find the average annual importations of bleached cotton cloth from Japan to be 49,048,520 square yards, whereas the importations for the first 10 months of last year were 46,746,503 square yards, or an actual annual decrease of 2,302,017 yards when comparing the average annual importations for the past 3 years.

I want to make clear, Mr. Chairman, that I hold no brief for the theory upon which the cotton-export plan is based, but if in practice and reality it succeeds in disposing of our surplus of raw cotton, affords a market for the surplus or increased finished product of the manufacturer at a fair price, and furnishes increased opportunity for employment of labor, both on the farm and factory, I am prepared to abandon my ideas about the theory involved. Of course, the matter is worthy of further consideration and I purpose to give it further study, but I am glad to find from these reports there is no necessity for being immediately unduly alarmed on account of the press report referred to. I hope to have time and opportunity to discuss the matter in more detail at a later date. Time seems to be rather precious here this afternoon.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the defense offered by the distinguished and learned gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], it might not be amiss to observe that an expert locksmith, who knows the combination of a safe, can open it quicker than another, even of comparable intelligence, who neither possesses the locksmith's skill and experience nor the combination.

The gentleman from Missouri and the members of our esteemed Committee on Appropriations are expert locksmiths, skilled and experienced in opening these safes to which they alone know the combinations. They can unlock any one of these safes on a moment's notice and produce any desired part of the contents. They are perfectly familiar with the contents of each, for they put them there. But to the rest of us the contents are a dark secret; we know not in what part of the safe they repose; we have neither the combination nor the experienced skill which they have acquired in working it. Therefore, we need more time than they for such a task. We must have more time if the House is to legislate. Under the existing system the subcommittees legislate, and the House tries to appear to know what is going on.

And why is there objection to our reasonable request that we be granted time to inform ourselves on the merits or demerits, if any, of these appropriation bills? Surely there is nothing to conceal. But if there were, that would be all the more reason for careful examination. The thought of many is that widespread study of these bills, reports, and hearings, would minimize opposition and enhance the high reputation enjoyed by the members of this great committee.

During the debate of the emergency supplemental appropriation bill, H. R. 7805, on January 12, 1940, I invited the attention of the Committee on Appropriations and of the House to the precipitancy which characterizes the handling of appropriation bills after they are reported by the subcommittees to the full committee—RECORD of January 12, page 306. I then pointed out that while the bill then racing to passage was composed of only 29 pages, and the hearings of only 325 pages, there would be other bills of far greater length, the hearings on which would require hundreds of printed pages, that would be rushed through the full committee with scant consideration, and brought to the floor of the House before any Member not on the Appropriations Committee had had a chance to see bill, report, or hearings, much less to read or study them. The pending bill is proof of that statement. It comprises 92 pages, and the hearings 1,593. It was reported Monday morning to the full committee, less than 2 hours before it was to be presented on the floor.

Another defect in our system of making appropriations is that each of the many bills is separate, and not considered as a part of the whole Budget picture. We should consider the whole Budget and make appropriation therefor in one bill. Only so can we get the proper perspective and weigh the claims of several departments, agencies, and services in the same scales.

These observations are made with the highest regard for the excellent work which has always been done by our Committee on Appropriations. No men could do better under our system. But if we better the system we shall enable these devoted and able experts to better the high standard they have set.

Now, let us look at this bill as best we may.

It runs the figure 2 through the amount we appropriated last year for the needs of the Department of Agriculture. Such a radical reduction flashes the red light. Surely the Nation's need of the services rendered by this vital Department has not so shrunk. Even the casual examination of the bill which time permits discloses that the ax has not been wielded indiscriminately. The appropriations for certain services are increased. For others they remain the same. For still others no money at all is allocated.

Congress solemnly enacted the Bankhead-Jones tenant farm-purchase law. It has worked well, and without ultimate cost to the Government. Seven thousand former tenants have become farm owners. Seven thousand home fires have been lighted in the pride of proprietorship. The Budget approved $25,000,000 for the furtherance of this program. Possibly this was not enough. Progress toward the desired end has been slow. But can progress be hastened by a dead and sudden stop?

Should a program ordained by Congress be thus abandoned?

The eradication of the white-fringed beetle—now well underway—must not be stopped. The appropriation for the continuation of this war of extermination, in which final and complete victory is near and assured, is also approved by the Budget. The experts in the Bureau of Entomology say that the white-fringed beetle is more dangerous to all plant life than all the other six well-known pests put together. It attacks all plant life. It is more dangerous to cotton, for instance, than the boll weevil and pink bollworm. Yet, because of fear of a point of order, every cent of this appropriation is eliminated.

Because of a similar technicality no money whatever is allocated, over and above the 30 percent of tariff receipts, for the splendid work of the Surplus Commodities Corporation. This agency is performing its task with vision and skill. It has prevented price collapse in the market for more than one important farm product. Its stamp program is scientific and effective.

Its distribution of commodities to the destitute has prevented untold misery at minimum cost. Its program is favored almost universally. Yet it must be crippled because the front door is blocked by technicality. But there is another door through which entrance may be effected. By all means let us see that it is used.

The appropriation to insure partial parity for farm prices is killed. The specious excuse advanced by some is that farm prices are up and parity payments may be unnecessary. This animadversion answers itself, for if farm prices equal or exceed 75 percent of parity the law prohibits any parity payments. If the full appropriation carried in last year's bill—$225,000,000—were in this one, not one cent of that money could be expended unless and until farm prices had been hammered down below 75 percent of parity.

Would that I had the time to elaborate these points already made and to cover the unwarranted cuts of the funds for forest-land acquisition, soil conservation, and for other meritorious purposes.

Suffice it to say that this bill cries out for scrutiny and amendment. We all favor economy and will vote for it. But if economy is to be judged solely by reduction of expenditures, we could close the whole governmental establishment and appropriate $7,000,000,000 less. Real economy must be wise economy. Some services are indispensable. Some protections are indisputably wise investments. Some programs build and save the Nation.

We have the brains and the patriotism to make this bill far better. Let us use them.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE].

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, we are considering a bill which all too many of our people and all too many Members of Congress look upon as an appropriation for one class or group of our citizens. Nothing could be further from the truth. We are today considering a bill which is not only of interest to every citizen in the United States, but a bill that relates to the one absolutely fundamental and essential activity of mankind—the one from which all other industries spring and on which they depend. Civilization begins and ends with the plow. Of the material possessions of civilized man only the land endures, and on its cultivation depends the very ability of mankind to exist. We all understand that if all production from our soil were stopped that our population would starve, but I fear that many of us have failed to realize that if all the farmers south of the Potomac River or west of the Allegheny Mountains were to cease to exist as consumers that three-fourths of the factories in Pennsylvania and New Jersey would be forced to close their gates. The industrial sections must have markets in the agricultural regions. These markets cannot be very good markets for your factories unless the people, the farmers of the Nation, may enjoy a larger share of the national income; and this great farm market cannot be as good a market as it should be until the farmer's income is on a parity with the income of other people in the United States. In other words, not until the farmer makes an income that will enable him to acquire with a day of his labor just as much of the usable goods of the world as the man working in a factory; not until you reach a parity of income between agriculture and industry will you have the greatest possible exchange of goods and the greatest possible prosperity for all groups. When you reduce farm purchasing power you destroy the market of American industry and you restrict the opportunity of employment for American labor. We have not reached a level of farm income anywhere near the level of parity. We are still getting less than 10 cents for cotton and less than a dollar for wheat, and these figures, when translated into man-hours, mean that our cotton farmers are still getting less than 10 cents per hour for their labor, but we have improved the situation. We have gone a long way from the depths of 1932. Let us not now, even in the name of economy, break down the existing farm income, and in so doing destroy the fountainhead of all economic recovery, urban as well as rural.

Seventy-five years ago we fought a war. In the South we fought for our homes and the rights of our States. In the North they fought to free the Negroes. Surely in 1865 everyone thought that this had been done, but since this time it must have become clear that all that has been done was to make slaves of the white man as well as of the black. Today we find the farmers of nearly all sections of our land in a state of economic serfdom far worse than any which exists among the poorest European peasants. In my own district probably more than two out of every three farmers are landless tenants. In one of my counties approximately three-fourths of all farmers are tenants. Most of the remaining one-fourth who are classed as owners have nothing more than a small equity in their homes, but even the ownership of this small equity is extremely important. The average income of the tenant farmer of my State is less than 50 cents per day. The total average gross income of all farmers of the South is less than $200 per year. Obviously, the living conditions of any group of people with such a small income must be very poor.

Congress has recognized the importance of enabling the tenant farmers of this country to help themselves become home owners, and 4 years ago we passed a bill holding out a small ray of hope. We made appropriations of $10,000,000 in 1938, $15,000,000 in 1939, and $40,000,000 in 1940. In all, we have made available for loans to tenant farmers $75,000,000. During the same time we have given $800,000,000 to the work of city slum clearance—a worthy work, but certainly it is hard to say that we have given to the rural slums the consideration we have given to city slum dwellers. Having already given 12 times as much to city slum clearance as we have loaned to this work of rural slum clearance, can you say that we are unreasonable in asking that this Government go on and carry out its existing obligation to loan $50,000,000 to tenant farmers to aid them in becoming home owners? But the committee asks that the entire appropriation for this great work be eliminated. Every time you refuse to loan a tenant farmer money to help him own a home, for which experience shows the Government will be repaid, you have created a prospective candidate for a home in a city slum-clearance project, where you know the Government will never get its money back.

Not only does this bill fail to provide one cent for a continuation of the promised program of farm-home ownership, it materially reduces the aid that the Government has so properly extended to soil conservation. Without an intelligent use and conservation of our soils this Nation must follow the great nations of antiquity into oblivion. When the productive soil of the Tigris and the Euphrates Valleys was allowed to wash and blow away, those large centers of civilization ceased to exist. If we neglect to protect the soils of our own land, we can only expect a repetition of the tragedies of the past—floods, freshets, and overflows, followed by drought, dust storms, and desolation. Nor will the desolation be confined to the farms. There is no city so strong and so proud that it can continue to flourish long after the hinterlands that made it are denuded. Erosion is a thing that strikes at the very foundation of all being as well as all prosperity. The soil must be preserved, and this Government and the merchants of Philadelphia have an interest in its preservation just as truly as has the farmer in the Delta. Yet this bill cuts around $4,000,000 from the $24,000,000 heretofore expended for the work of the Soil Conservation Service.

Of course, the most staggering blow dealt by this bill to the farmer is the refusal to carry on the program of parity adjustment payments. It is true that we have never paid our farmer anything like enough to bring his income up to the parity which we held out as a hope when we passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act, but we have helped. We have increased farm income and in so doing we have increased national income. For 20 years factory pay rolls in this country have followed absolutely exactly farm income. In other words, for every dollar used to increase farm income you have likewise increased factory pay rolls by the same amount, and national income by seven times that amount. In no other expenditure can we have any assurance of such a direct return to the people of all the Nation.

We have, it is true, helped the farmers of America, but they are still down on their knees—in the South down on their knees before the great white throne of ailing King Cotton. Should we not give those needy and helpless Americans who feed and clothe the balance of us a helping hand rather than the brutal blow contained in this bill?

My friends, let us look to the need of our farmers. Let us look to the dependence of all industry on farming, and let us restore to this bill those meager aids heretofore promised to agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON].

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I realize that there are many things that are fundamentally wrong in the life of the midwestern farmer. One of those things is the unjust, inequitable freight-rate structure just referred to by my good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER]. It is indeed a major problem that this House must tackle sooner or later. So is the item of real-estate taxes also referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota. It would indeed be well to give both of these matters serious consideration in this body, but serious as these are today, I want to address myself to one item which has been left out of this bill—the farm-tenancy appropriation.

Balance the budget of the farmers, and the home owners of this country and the National Budget will balance itself.

The Appropriations Committee reports that it tried to make cuts in this bill "where they would be the least harmful to the public interest."

I would like to see the committee try to justify application of that language to its action on the appropriation for tenant-purchase loans. The committee has proposed to abandon what has been hailed in all parts of the Nation as one of the most constructive programs instituted by the New Deal.

We like to think of America as a nation of home owners. It once was. Half a century ago 80 percent of our farmers were owners. But today almost half of our farmers are renters, or have an even more precarious hold on the land as sharecroppers. Even on the rich soil of my own Iowa, 50 percent of the farmers are tenants.

Unless we do something to stop this swift tide, our independent, family-sized farmer, who has been the backbone of our Nation since its first days, will be wiped out. In place of our home-loving, secure, and stable farm population, we will have a rural population composed chiefly of restless, constantly moving tenants, and poverty-stricken, part-time farm laborers. Our land will be owned by banks, insurance companies, and a few big business operators.

Already a third of our huge farm-tenant population—or a million families—move every year. Hundreds of thousands of other families have lost all hold on the land and are desperately roving the highways in search of occasional, seasonal work, that at best will barely keep them alive.

Every year there are 40,000 additional tenant families, and probably almost as many new migrants, added to the roving population.

Two major efforts to halt this trend have been instituted by the Government. One of them, which is not involved in the current appropriation item, is the Farm Security Administration program of rehabilitation loans, which seeks to anchor the low-income farmer to the land by making him a more successful farmer and helping him to obtain better rental terms.

The other program—which is definitely at stake here—is the second step in this rehabilitation program, under which these farmers who have been converted into more successful tenants can consolidate their gains by becoming owners of their land.

This program was begun on a slow, experimental basis almost 3 years ago. Although we have appropriated only $75,000,000, this is enabling about 13,000 former tenants, sharecroppers, and farm laborers to buy farms of their own—family-sized farms which they can operate themselves, and on which they can raise their families in comparative security. In Iowa 121 loans, aggregating $1,176,157, have been made, and 140 more are being made this year.

Though this program is less than 3 years old, it has demonstrated conclusively that it is a sound approach to this vital and fundamental problem of farm ownership. The only serious criticism I have heard of the program outside of this House is that it is not big enough to do the job. But surely that is no reason for abandoning it, any more than we would abandon our efforts to stamp out disease just because we have not been able to stop all disease.

As pointed out by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], critics here on the floor have compared the tenant purchase program with other and unsuccessful efforts to finance farm ownership. Such comparisons are worthless, because never before has there been a program so carefully planned, so soundly conceived, as the one now before us.

Never before has the lending agency exercised such caution in the selection of borrowers and the selection of the farms they were to buy. Never before has the lending agency extended expert guidance and advice to borrowers to help them succeed. Never before has the lending agency set up a variable payment plan under which the borrower would pay more in good-crop years and less in bad years. All of these things make the tenant purchase program a thing apart from other lending plans.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. If the gentleman has not had the matter called to his attention, may I say that I am advised there has been paid into the Treasury substantially more money than is due; in other words, the farmers have taken advantage of the provisions referred to by the gentleman and paid back more money than is due. Further, there is now only a 2-percent delinquency. Although the testimony in the hearing showed about a 4-percent delinquency, Mr. Baldwin tells me that the figures as brought down to date now show only a 2-percent delinquency, with more money paid in than is due.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I thank the gentleman from Texas for his contribution. A little later I expect to show those figures.

Every farmer who has obtained a tenant purchase loan has been carefully selected by a committee of local farmers in his own county, and usually from among 20 or more applicants. Every farm bought has been appraised on its past production records. In every case the lender and the borrower have worked out a plan for operating the farm which promised not only to support the family adequately but to repay the loan. In every case farm- and home-management advisers have been constantly on hand to help the family work out the plan.

No wonder, under these conditions, that the program has succeeded. No wonder the delinquencies are less than 2 percent, despite the fact that the borrowers could not obtain adequate funds anywhere else on reasonable terms. No wonder 133,000 farmers in less than half of the agricultural counties of the Nation applied this year for these loans.

No wonder, fellow Members of the House, that the committee does not attempt to justify this cut except on the general ground of economy.

Yet, where is the economy? Is it economy to permit our farmers to drift into tenancy and onto the relief rolls? And has it actually cost the Treasury anything from the long-range standpoint to invest in farms virtually all of which are being improved rather than ruined, as they were under tenancy?

There can be little doubt that because of the way this program has been operated most of the farms on which the Government has loaned money are more valuable today than they were when they were bought at rock-bottom prices. Even in the cases of ultimate delinquency the Government is likely to come out without substantial loss.

So to me, at least, this proposal to save $25,000,000 is a proposal to throw overboard a program which has proved wise economically and wise socially. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I must say that I am disappointed in the agricultural appropriations bill presented to this House for consideration. I know that the farmers of the United States, when they learn the contents of this bill, will be likewise greatly disappointed. Even a cursory study of the bill indicates the drastic extent to which appropriations for the farmers of the Nation have been reduced and in many instances shows where entire services have been discontinued. Oftentimes the eliminations have occurred in spite of the fact that Congress has previously authorized and specifically provided for functions eliminated under the provisions of this act. Time will not permit me here to go fully into all phases of these reductions. I desire, however, especially to call your attention to the reductions in the Soil Conservation Service. In all phases of this work we have a reduction of approximately $7,000,000 over the original estimates for this Department. From all parts of the United States have come protests against these reductions and statements as to the injury which will be inflicted by even this small cut in appropriations for this most worthy purpose.

After all, Mr. Chairman, soil conservation deals with the primary asset of the Nation, namely, the land. It seeks to correct the erosion which has been going on in this Nation for the last 150 years and longer. It seeks to teach our farmers how to conserve the land resources which are far and above all others the most vital and most essential to the Nation; and yet at a time when our farmers are learning conservation practices which are so important not only to themselves but to the future generations, and at a time when they are eager to go forward with this work, the appropriation is cut. This will mean that certain conservation watershed districts will not even be touched in the work of the Soil Conservation Service, and the work in other watershed districts will be greatly reduced.

The Land Utilization Section of the Soil Conservation Service likewise suffers heavily from the drastic cut made in this bill. In this service submarginal land is taken by the Government and improved to the point that it becomes subject to use and habitation by the farmers of the United States. It has been estimated that were this work carried to a full conclusion in the State of Louisiana alone 41,000 additional farm homes might be established and 41,000 additional farm families might be cared for by the appropriate use and improvement of submarginal land.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read a resolution received by me recently from the police jury—the governing body—of the parish of Webster, La. This resolution is typical of the many resolutions I have received from both governmental and private agencies showing the deep concern which these people evince in any reduction to soil-conservation funds. Let me read:

Resolution No. 240

TO HON. OVERTON BROOKS:

Whereas it has been called to our attention through the press and news releases that the general appropriation bill now being considered by Congress proposes a reduction of funds from the past appropriation for soil conservation, land utilization, and Civilian Conservation Corps; and

Whereas we, the Police Jury of Webster Parish, La., are vitally interested in the soil conservation and land utilization of the land in Webster Parish in order to promote prosperity of the people of our parish, those living on the farms as well as those in business who are dependent on the farm for their general welfare; and

Whereas the Civilian Conservation Corps in this area has given employment to veterans of the World War who could not find employment elsewhere and has given employment and training to youth reaching manhood who could not find employment, and who, if not employed, would have been subject to temptation leading to law violations, which not only would have been detrimental to the general public but expense to the State; and

Whereas the people of Webster Parish felt that the Civilian Conservation Corps is the outstanding accomplishment of the present administration and is subject to less criticism than any other governmental agency; and

Whereas the Soil Conservation Service through proper utilization, with the aid of those employed in the Civilian Conservation Corps, has been a material aid to this parish through the employment of youth and unemployed veterans of the World War and the purchase of approximately 10,000 acres of submarginal land in Webster Parish; and

Whereas the farmers of the Dorcheat soil-conservation district have shown their interest and enthusiasm and desire for aid from the present program by the following facts:

First. Soil-conservation district organized January 1939 and began operation June 1939, comprising more than 1,080,000 acres, 75 percent of which is in need of land-utilization and soil-conservation treatment.

Second. The December report of the soil-conservation district shows 347 farmers owning 61,844 acres of land have applied to the district for service. The Soil Conservation Service has been able to reach 181 farmers, owning 22,971 acres at the present time, and more than 100 applications have been received by the supervisors of the Dorcheat district since the December report.

Third. Two hundred and sixteen applications, comprising 43,721 acres, have been received from Webster Parish, and of these plans have been made on 82 farms comprising 32,354 acres; and

Whereas at present the approved budget for the Dorcheat soil-conservation district is approximately $30,000 per year, all of which is needed to continue the work at the present rate; and if the proposed appropriation for Soil Conservation Service is reduced as recommended it is estimated that this district will receive only approximately $24,000, which will materially slow down the work now being done; and

Whereas work will be considerably accelerated if the appropriation remains approximately where it was for the current year: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Police Jury of Webster Parish in session, That you are requested to consider carefully these facts and others at your disposal, and we do hereby recommend that, if it is possible, the appropriation for the Soil Conservation Service, land utilization, and Civilian Conservation Corps be not reduced unless absolutely necessary.

WEBSTER PARISH POLICE JURY,
J. M. PEARCE, President.
RUTH LUNSFORD, Secretary.

State of Louisiana, parish of Webster, Minden, La.

I am sure that other Members have received similar resolutions from those people who live on the land and see the wonderful work of soil conservation from day to day.

Mr. Chairman, I might say also that this bill completely eliminates all appropriations for the Commodity Credit Corporation and the appropriations under the Sugar Act of 1937. It reduces surplus commodities appropriations from $113,000,000 to $72,678,000.

Farm Security Administration comes in for drastic reduction also in this bill and the amount recommended by the bill is $25,000,000 as against $40,000,000 appropriated for 1940. And then the Agricultural Adjustment Administration program is completely eliminated. Not one cent is appropriated for A. A. payments to the farmers of the United States as against the sum of $225,000,000 which was appropriated last year for this same purpose.

I am glad, however, to learn that the deficiency bill now before the Senate carries an arrangement for the transfer of a sum of a little less than $10,000,000 to take care of the payments under the Price Adjustment Act of 1938. I am informed by the Agriculture Department that funds appropriated last year by Congress covered only about 87 percent of these payments and this additional sum is necessary to conclude the 1939 payments. The farmers of the Nation have been promised these so-called parity payments and a severe hardship has been imposed upon them by failure to make these payments timely and prompt as have been intended by the Department of Agriculture. This sum does not represent an additional amount appropriated to the farmers but means merely a transfer of funds previously appropriated for this same purpose. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would like to read a letter received by me about 2 weeks ago from the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture, in reference to this same matter. I read:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 4, 1940.

HON. OVERTON BROOKS,
Member of Congress,
Shreveport, La.

DEAR MR. BROOKS: This acknowledges your telegram of December 19 relative to payments under the 1939 price-adjustment program.

The Price Adjustment Act of 1938 provided a separate appropriation of $212,000,000 for parity payments to producers of wheat, cotton, corn (in the commercial corn-producing area), rice, and tobacco, pursuant to section 303 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. In order to determine the rate of payment for the various commodities with respect to which price-adjustment payments would be made, it was necessary to estimate the probable participation in the 1939 price-adjustment program far in advance of the actual time of making payments. Participation was in excess of that estimated, so that the funds provided by the aforementioned appropriation were not sufficient to complete all payments to producers.

No authority exists whereby funds from any other appropriation could be used for the purpose of making 1939 price-adjustment payments. In order that the balance of these payments may be made, Congress is being advised that part of the $225,000,000 which was appropriated for the 1940 parity-payment program should be made available for the purpose of completing payments due under the 1939 price-adjustment program. It is hoped that favorable action on the part of Congress will be forthcoming early in the next session. If so, the balance of the payments due under the 1939 price-adjustment program will be made immediately.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, this Congress has been worrying itself about the problems of the Chinese and about the problems of the Europeans. It has sought to help the people of Argentina and to furnish protection to the entire continent of South America. It is now proposed to make an actual loan to the Finns to help them in their suffering and misery. It seems that Congress is preparing to help all the peoples of the world and yet it turns its back on its own people.

The proposed cut in soil conservation, which totals, roughly, some $10,000,000, will mean a great hardship upon the farmers in all parts of the United States. It will mean, so I am informed, a cut in the activities of soil conservation throughout the United States of 15 percent of the entire work. It will mean a further cut of 20 percent in the actual personal direction and supervision work of soil conservation throughout the Nation. It will mean that many soil-conservation districts will not even be touched during the coming year, and that other districts which are reached will have their work drastically reduced.

Of all of the work being done for the people of the United States, I doubt that there is any work which means such a long-time saving and benefit to our people as does the work of the Soil Conservation Service. It means the checking of the erosion of the soil; the restoring of some of the washed-away land; the refertilization of millions of acres of land; and the revitalizing of much land which had become unfit for farm use.

Before taking care of the troubles of the world we should provide for our own people. The 33,000,000 people who live on the farms throughout the United States are entitled to the attention of this Congress. Drastic reductions should not begin with the farmers but certainly should be begun in the appropriations which seek to correct the problems of other peoples.

The Bible tells us:

But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Gossett].

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Chairman, those of us seriously interested in the farmers of America and in stabilizing American agriculture are shocked to find the appropriation anticipated to carry on the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act eliminated in the report and recommendation of the Appropriations Committee.

Every average American farmer who desires to do so ought to be able to own and to make a decent living upon a family-sized farm. Today thousands of such farmers roam the streets of our towns and cities, and can neither rent nor buy land. While the farmer, as an unorganized, unprotected, rugged individualist, has always suffered economic discrimination at the hands of organized groups, still, prior to the depression, he was always able to rent or buy land; and by hard work he was able to live upon and from the land. Today many thousands of men, who were among America's best farmers and best citizens, can neither rent nor buy a farm. This Farm Tenant Act, which some of you gentlemen propose to kill, offers an opportunity to some of these good farmers, and it gives encouragement to all.

Agriculture is the oldest and most fundamental of all human enterprises. The tillers of the soil have since the beginning of time been the backbone of every stable society. It was the embattled farmers at Concord Bridge who fired the shots heard around the world—shots that resulted in American independence and in the formation of the democratic Government under which we have enjoyed more than a century of unparalleled prosperity and progress.

Agriculture has always been the most important activity of the American people, and our farmers have been since the beginning the bulwark of American democracy. It has always been thus with every great people. Emerson once said:

The first farmer was the first man; and all historic nobility rests on possession and use of land.

LXXXVI—55

Cato testifies:

The agricultural population produces the bravest men, the most valiant soldiers, and a class of citizens the least given of all to evil designs.

We could even cite Thomas Jefferson as an authority in this instance. He once said:

Wherever there is in any country uncultivated lands and unemployed poor, it is clear that the laws of prosperity have been so far extended as to violate natural rights. The earth is given as a common stock for men to labor on. * * * The small landowners are the most precious part of the State.

The home owner, especially the landowner, the man who lives upon and gets his living from the soil, is never a radical or a revolutionist. He is a man of sturdy character, of high ideals, of unquestioned patriotism. He is a lover of liberty and of justice; he is a defender of all the worth-while institutions. It is said that the late Pancho Villa of Mexico, whose escapades you will remember, and against whom there was sent an American expeditionary force under the command of General Pershing, when given a ranch by the Mexican Government, completely changed his way of living and his philosophy of life, and became a staunch defender of the rights of private property. This problem, therefore, becomes a social as well as an economic one.

Approximately 7,000,000 American families live upon the farm, almost one-third of our population earn their livelihood from the land. The tenant percentage of these families has increased. In 1880, 25.6 percent of American farm families were tenants; in 1890, 28.4 percent; in 1900, 35.3 percent; in 1910, 37 percent; in 1920, 38.1 percent; in 1930, 42.4 percent; and in 1935, 42.1 percent. In Texas, the greatest agricultural State of the Union, 57.1 percent of the farmers are tenants, while 41 percent of the owner-operated farms are under mortgage, according to 1935 statistics. In my district of Texas, and I believe this is generally true throughout the country, the percentage of tenancy has been increasing and farm population generally has been decreasing. In several counties of my district, farm populations have decreased as much as 25 percent in the last 20 years.

For several years, landowners in an effort to pay mortgages and debts have resorted to large-scale farming and have ejected more and more of their tenants. The towns of my district are now filled with tenant farmers, many of whom were yesterday well-to-do and self-sustaining citizens.

These men and other farmers of this country have not seriously complained. They have always been a conservative force in American life. They believe in true economy. They also believe in economic and social justice. They would not accept more of anything than was rightfully theirs. They only insist upon, and only are entitled to receive, an opportunity to share equally with every other class of Americans in a common prosperity.

An able and influential Member of this body in the name of economy has stated, in effect, as the main reason for eliminating the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, that said act did not reach all of the deserving tenants but only a few of them. His argument is that since we cannot give much relief, we should give no relief at all; that since we cannot do much good, we will not do any good. This is defeatism at its worst. This is answering the cry for bread with a stone. This is turning a deaf ear to the almost universal plea of serious-minded American citizens that the trend of decreasing farm populations be reversed and that we have in America a back-to-the-farm movement. This so-called economy wave is like a cyclone. It has struck in the strangest and most unexpected places in a freakish manner and with disastrous results. It would eliminate every vestige of a farm-tenant program in this country. It would eliminate an appropriation that is certain to be repaid with interest and that will yield valuable dividends in many other ways. If to eliminate this appropriation you were saving money and increasing governmental efficiency, if you were abolishing a Government bureau, or cutting down excessive overhead expenses, you would hear nothing from the farmers of America. They believe in efficiency and economy. But by this act, you simply deny this credit to good American farmers who want to own and live upon the land. Farm ownership can only be promoted by long-period loans at low-interest rates, and only the Government can furnish this credit at this time. If this act is killed some better and more comprehensive act should be immediately passed to take its place.

I was greatly interested to note in this week's press reports of a speech made by House minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Representative JOE MARTIN. Speaking at Topeka, Kans., the gentleman from Massachusetts, Representative MARTIN, is reported as saying:

The greatest danger to the peace and security of the United States is not from foreign invasion, but to allow pressing home problems to go unsolved. * * * We must solve the problems of agriculture so the farmer can secure his fair share of the national income. * * * We must rescue the small farmer and the small employer from the domineering Federal bureaucracy. * * * Our front line is not on the Rhine, nor is it anywhere in France. It is at the farm gate and the factory door.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, Representative MARTIN, usually speaks for the vast majority of the Republican Members of the House. I hope he did so in this case. I am one Democrat who certainly endorses the statements just quoted from Representative MARTIN's Kansas speech. The farmers of America, gentlemen, expect more than lip service to the cause of American agriculture. It is sincerely hoped that you gentlemen on the Republican side of the House vote in line with this expressed sentiment of your leader.

There is no end to the sound arguments that could be made for an adequate farm-tenant program in this country. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts, Representative MARTIN, has sensed the shrewd judgment and good sense of the average American. The average American loves his country and believes in her adequate defense. He is not willing, however, to take money from the empty pockets of farmers of this country and bread out of the hungry mouths of the unemployed of this country to build excessive armament in the name of national defense. The $25,000,000 asked for the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act is less than half the price of a modern battleship, dozens of which this Congress is being called upon to authorize.

Mr. Chairman, we should not be penny-wise and pound-foolish. Instead of eliminating this money, which we propose to loan the American farmer, it should be increased at least to $100,000,000. Upon the stabilization of the average American farmer must, in the last analysis, rest the strength and security of this Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH].

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who are rather disappointed as a result of the decreased appropriations in the agricultural bill.

One of the most paradoxical situations I have witnessed since becoming a Member of this Congress is the one which is obtaining right now. We were told in the President's message, correctly so, that even though the national income is increasing, yet the farmer's share of the national income is still far below what it should be. In 1933 agriculture, or the farmers, who constitute almost one-third of our population, received only about 9 percent of the national income.

In the wake of this statement, however, came the recommendation that there be no appropriations for parity payments and that the amount to be expended for soil conservation and other rehabilitating activities be greatly reduced. How can any thinking and sincere person reconcile the two viewpoints? If the economic health of the farmers is less evident than that of other groups and if the statistics of the Department of Commerce as to the national income constitute an accurate criterion, then apparently he needs much more help instead of being made the "goat" in this Budget slashing. I was surprised and amazed when I found that of the $600,000,000 reduction in the Budget the Agriculture Department and the farmers had sustained two-thirds of it or some $400,000,000.

Looking at the situation in a fair and impartial way, no person can see any justification for cutting even further the agricultural appropriation bill—certainly not to the disproportionate degree of some 47 percent.

Congress, if it acquiesces in these slashes, is breaking faith with many farmers who have endeavored to adapt themselves to those rules and regulations prescribed by the A. A. A. They have changed their farming practices greatly. Mr. DIRKSEN, I believe, pointed out yesterday that each person who procures an F. S. A. loan must be a complier with the program. One of the rewards for complying heretofore has been the parity payment. How is he to receive it if there is no appropriation made for this purpose? And is it right for the farmers to curtail production through the promise of parity and then withhold the payments?

I know it is contended by those who oppose appropriating money to pay parity payments that the war will probably take up the slack in that our agricultural sales to foreign countries will increase. I heard Secretary Wallace testify in behalf of the trade agreements before the Ways and Means Committee and he seemed to give little hope to the realization of this possibility, but indicated that, although sales of certain types of commodities—not necessarily agricultural—might increase, yet this very fact would preclude the likelihood of the given countries being financially able to buy additional agricultural commodities. To substantiate his statement, he cited the World War period. Even though this contingency might be realized, it is completely nonsensical to put the farmers out on a present-war limb which will be sawed off by the termination of the war. The American farmer deserves more consideration than that. He must not be compelled to depend on markets accruing because of an existent war for his financial stability and economic security.

While I am speaking of these parity payments, I beg to disagree with what some of my colleagues have announced as their opinions as to an immediate means of financing the parity payments. It seems to me highly discriminatory to compel the Congress to raise money to pay parity payments to the farmers when such superwillingness is manifested so frequently to appropriate any amount of money for many other purposes without a similar stipulation. It would be justifiable to specify this, if farmers were receiving a bounty, a gift, or a donation, but this is not the case. The payment of so-called parity, the way I understand it, is a simple medium designed for the sole and only purpose of bringing about equity or fairness to the American farmer. As one Member said yesterday, it is not a bounty, but restitution. By virtue of the acts of Congress we have aided industry many years through the tariff; it is certainly fair to then say to industry, "You have received your bonus, your protection, and now to equalize the situation, we shall give the farmer something so that he will then have an amount equal to what you have already received."

Much has been repeatedly said about the progress which has been made in solving the farm problem. I cannot gainsay this, but I do contend that the farm problem is far from being solved. In my particular vicinity, a vicinity typical of the South, our problems are about as numerous as ever. Landlords and tenants are vocal in their enumeration of certain undesirable aspects of the present program. Landlords on the one hand continuously assert that they are having difficulty in meeting their land payments, their interest on these land payments, their taxes, and their ordinary outlay of expense in keeping up, so to speak, their farms, alleging that tenants do not desire to work without pay to maintain fences, and buildings, and so forth. They further contend that since their production has been appreciably curtailed, it is imperative that they take moves with respect to their respective farms to fortify themselves in order that their lands may not depart from them through the foreclosure gate.

Accordingly, in many sections of my district, there is a tendency for the landlord to divest his renters of their places, to buy a tractor or large farm machinery, to rent to the renter by the month the house in which the renter has been living, to hire the renter during crop time, to discharge him during the laying-by period, and to again employ him by the unit to gather the crop of the landlord, after which the renter reverts back to his status as a virtual transient. This practice is for a purpose, the purpose being to so arrange the farm program as it concerns a given farm whereby the landlord can obtain all the parity payment and all the conservation amount. Of course, such a practice is helpful at the moment to the landlord and some of them allege it is necessary for them to do this.

But this does not draw all the picture. The renter who has been divested of the place he worked either on halves or on third and fourth cannot usually find another place. He roams a bit, is compelled to sell his cows, his hogs, his chickens, and his work stock during some period when he cannot obtain work. He soon becomes discouraged, dejected, and disanimated. Having heard of the W. P. A. and seeing no ray of hope whatsoever, he decides to move to town that he may identify himself with the W. P. A. Sadly disappointed he is destined to be, for there in town he finds the W. P. A. quota filled and more than filled. The result is that a person who once had successfully sustained himself becomes a dependent.

The foregoing description is by no means rare in the vicinity in which I live and no person who has witnessed such can fail to be keenly aware as to the seriousness of the problem brought forth. That the trend should and must be changed is obvious and patent.

A perusal of the report on the bill and the bill itself discloses that the farm-tenant fund is to be practically nil this coming fiscal year. Not every phase of the attempts made by the Federal Government to aid tenants can I approve, but I do know the objective is extremely laudable and I am not willing to discontinue a program that apparently has done some good and gives real and genuine promise of developing into a program or at least being the forerunner of a program that will be broad in its scope and fully successful. The average loan, I understand, has been some $4,000. This is much too high, I am constrained to believe. I personally was practically reared on a place which cost my father less than $700. Says someone, "But land prices vary." This is true; however, I cannot believe they should vary to the extent that the average cost per place is $4,000, for accompanying a loan this large are two outstanding drawbacks, one, the fact that a debt this large is next to impossible to pay with agricultural prices as they are; the other, that too few people can be reached when the average amounts are that large.

Much more useful a program would we have if it were placed on a level within sounder reach of the family-size farmer. Even though some of the aspects of the program may be justly criticized, yet I cannot favor junking it when tenantry is increasing at the rate of fifty or sixty thousand families per year.

It must be remembered in considering the American farmer that you are considering the veritable bulwark of democracy; subversive elements boring from within or from without strike stone when they begin to work on him. But the American farmer has the same burning desires that every alert American citizen has, and he must be satiated if he is to always remain as stalwart as he has always been. He is willing to bear his proper share of deprivation and economic distress, but no more. I fear many Members of Congress and many high in the Government do not have as clear a conception of the burden he is now, and has been, carrying as he actually is. You know—

It's easy to sit in the sunshine,
And talk to the man in the shade,
It's easy to float in a well-trimmed boat,
And point out the places to wade,
It's easy to tell the toiler how best
He may carry his pack;
But no man can rate a burden's weight
Until it's been on his back.

Few people who have not observed the plight of farmers in the last few years can rate the weight of their burdens, especially the weight of the burdens of the little farmer—the family size farmer. It is difficult for those who are removed from the farmers to know that in my section of the country many of the farmers have allotments of 8, 10, 15, and 20 acres of cotton—I mention cotton because it is still our chief money crop—and on the acres they grow 2, 3, 4, 6, or 10 bales of cotton, which brings at the present some $80, $120, $160, $240, or $400 by the time incidental expenses are deducted. Yes; it is incredible to picture a family trying to live on these paltry pittance. No wonder some farmers are glad to identify themselves with the W. P. A., for in some instances it actually means more dollars.

The least this Congress should consider doing is to assure the farmers of the so-called parity payments—actually the $225,000,000 provides only 75-percent parity—by restoring the $225,000,000 to the bill. The soil-conservation work and the soil-conservation payments should not be diminished one iota. Any action short of this, in my opinion, is dereliction of duty. Let us not forget the "forgotten man."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the agriculture appropriation bill which we are now considering is the greatest disappointment that agriculture has received since I have been a Member of this House. I do not believe any large group of our citizens in the United States have been harder hit than the farmers have been during the past 10 years. Very serious efforts have been made to help the farmer. I believe that many conscientious Members of this House have really given most serious thought to the pressing problem of agriculture. I am afraid that some things have been done which did not work out to the best interest of agriculture every time, but I am willing to concede that the sponsors of those moves, for the most part, have been sincere. Now, this appropriation bill takes the very heart out of agriculture. It destroys the hopes that have been built up in the hearts of millions of our citizens. It greatly hinders and cripples a great arm of our citizenry.

We have been hearing a great deal for a number of years about the farm-tenancy problem. This House has considered that problem for days. We passed a law to help that situation. We followed up that act with a modest appropriation. While it was only a modest beginning, many of us who were in a better position to know the problems which that act sought to correct felt that a great forward step had been taken. We felt that from that act benefits would flow to thousands of farm families formerly denied an opportunity. We visioned that the time would come when a great portion of our farm families would be able to own and operate their own homes and thus make them secure again. While we were content to begin at the inception of this act with a small appropriation, we felt that the benefits derived from it in the reestablishment of farm homes would be so obvious that Congress would be justified in not only continuing the farm-tenancy program but would be willing to increase the appropriation each year, at least within reasonable bounds. I am told by the Farm Security Administration that when the money in sight is used up it will have purchased some fifteen or sixteen thousand farms. Some fifteen or sixteen thousand families will therefore be rehabilitated. But the committee has seen fit in this bill to cut out this program entirely. The good that has been done will be lost. I sincerely trust that the Farm Security Administration will be backed up by this House with a reasonable appropriation to carry on this all-important work.

The hardest problem that we have had to meet insofar as agriculture is concerned is the undertaking to bring farm receipts up to some sort of level comparable to the receipts of other industries in the United States. The farmer has long been at the bottom of the ladder. Congress has held out to the farmer a hope that the receipts from his labor would be on a parity with other labor in the country. We from the Farm Belt have cooperated with the laboring classes in every section of the country. We have been glad to see the laborer rewarded and given a just compensation. We have undertaken to equalize the very unequal situation existing between agriculture and the balance of the country by providing a measure of parity payments. Although the goal of parity payments is far above anything yet attained, still the appropriation made last year went a long way to achieve that end with the result that agriculture was placed upon a much sounder footing than heretofore. The committee in bringing in this bill likewise by one fell swoop has eliminated parity payments entirely. If this appropriation bill stands as it is now with parity payments eliminated, the situation with agriculture throughout the Nation will be very serious. With decreased production, with prices decreased, because of a lack of purchasing power and with every hope of parity payments being destroyed, unless this item is restored, we cannot hope for anything more than more destitution, more want among the millions engaged in agriculture. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this Congress will not permit this to take place. I do not believe this Democratic administration can afford to permit it to be done. I trust that it will be restored.

Our agricultural leaders have been educating the people for many years to the necessity of conserving our soils. The American people have not been careful with their resources. I have seen the statement that we are losing about 300,000 acres of soil per year. At this rate, Dr. Bennett, of the Soil Conservation Service, estimates that in probably 150 years the United States will not be self-sustaining, agriculturally speaking. It is a sad commentary upon our use, or rather misuse, of this great Nation with the finest soil in the world. We have now awakened to the situation and are endeavoring to conserve our soils. We have been encouraged to create soil-erosion districts in many agricultural States. Many such districts have been created. Instead of less funds being needed, more funds are needed. In fact, I am informed that about $3,000,000 additional money was asked for. Instead of that sum being granted, we find the Appropriation Committee cutting down the present amount about 15 percent. All of which means that this activity will have to be curtailed at least 15 percent. This, likewise, should not be tolerated. All the people of the Nation should realize that it is to the interest of all the people to conserve our resources. I hope that this cut will not only be eliminated but that the sum asked for will be granted.

Another very serious blow that has been handed agriculture in this bill is the elimination of the appropriation for the purchase of surplus commodities. That fund, no doubt, has been wisely used heretofore to relieve great surpluses in different sections, and by so doing to stabilize agriculture. This should be reinstated likewise.

Again the committee has seen fit to eliminate the appropriation under the Sugar Act of 1937. The committee completely ignored the plight of the sugar producers. Not being permitted to plant acreage sufficient to satisfy the needs of our own people, and having our country supplied to a great extent by sugar from the foreign country of Cuba, our sugar growers now face elimination of the funds provided by the act of 1937. This unquestionably should be restored.

All in all, Mr. Chairman, the committee has cut down the appropriations for agriculture about one-half. I am ready to economize where it is possible, but I have not seen the economy ax swing in any other branch of our national life like this. There is no sense, no fairness, in visiting such upon agriculture. I want these injustices rectified. I am at a loss to understand what prompted the committee in making these drastic reductions on agriculture. Surely this Congress, undoubtedly this Democratic administration, will not let that stand. Is it economy to try to economize on the man who is most needy? Our farming population represents about a third of our population. If this Congress is going to do this to agriculture, then let us swing the economy ax in other directions. Let us not single out agriculture, our very basic industry. Let us rather put this third of our Nation on a firm foundation by such remedial and protective measures as may be necessary. This country cannot go forward until the millions on the farm receive a price sufficient, and have income sufficient, to give them the proper purchasing power. I shall avail myself of every opportunity to work for and vote for a square deal for the farmer.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the Appropriations Committee has a very hard job on its hands in trying to approach anything like a balanced Budget. I appreciate the work they are trying to do, but I do want to lodge my protest against the effort to balance the Budget at the expense of the farmers of this country.

I am particularly concerned with the action of the committee in failing to provide funds for parity payments to farmers. For 10 years this promise has been held out to the farmers. During that time every seriously considered farm program has proposed to give parity. But today we are offered an appropriation bill with no parity funds in it.

The suggestion may be made that the war will restore farmers to parity without need of a farm program. In his appearance before the committee, Secretary Wallace anticipated that and answered it completely by the insertion of a table showing the effect of the war on farm and nonfarm incomes compared with cost of living as well as the ratio between farm and nonfarm income. The table is as follows:

Farm and nonfarm income available for living, 1909-39

The other great defect, as I see it, in this bill is its failure to provide funds for further farm purchases under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act.

This proposal to eliminate appropriations for loans to tenants for the purchase of farms is the most dangerous kind of false economy.

On the surface, it looks like a saving of $25,000,000 to the Government. Actually, it would mean severe losses to the Nation in the long run.

Our once independent, landowning farmers are rapidly becoming a class of insecure, restless, and dependent tenants, sharecroppers, and farm laborers. The tenure system under which they operate is ruinous not only to them, but to their landlords, and to the soil. They are running up a huge ultimate cost to the Government for the rehabilitation of men and soil.

In the counties of my own district of Alabama, more than 66 percent of the farmers are tenants. In these few counties of Jackson, Lauderdale, Colbert, Limestone, Lawrence, Morgan, and Madison, 24,238 of the 36,480 farmers listed by the last census are tenants working land they do not own and in which they have no interest, except to mine it for the largest possible immediate cash return.

By counties the farm-tenancy bill in my district is as follows:

	Number of farms	Number of tenants	Percent, tenancy
Colbert.....	2,726	1,798	66.0
Jackson.....	5,517	3,250	59.0
Lauderdale.....	5,170	3,180	61.0
Lawrence.....	4,855	3,408	70.0
Limestone.....	6,266	4,521	72.0
Madison.....	7,034	5,085	72.0
Morgan.....	4,912	2,996	61.0
Total.....	36,480	24,238	66.4

This is by no means an isolated case. In the State of Alabama, only 3 out of every 10 farm operators are full owners. In the United States, 42 percent of all farmers are tenants, operating land and buildings valued at $11,000,000,000. Most of them move to a different farm every year or two.

What does this mean? It means that the soil—in which every citizen has a stake whether he lives on a farm or in the city—is being worked on a “here today, gone tomorrow” basis. It means that thousands of farmers are discouraged about the prospects of farm ownership, and, in the meantime, are losing any incentive they might have of conserving the soil for future generations.

We have found an effective means to combat this destructive tendency of absentee ownership in the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act. During the past 2 years, Congress has wisely appropriated funds to finance the purchase of 13,000 farms by tenants who could not get credit for this purpose from any other source.

The operation of this act eventually will establish a pattern of farm ownership throughout the Nation. It is a channel through which farm tenants of character and ability can settle themselves permanently on the land, derive a living from that land, and protect it as a source of future productivity.

It is an investment in the welfare of our farm people and a guarantee of the protection of the soil. If it is economy we are after, this is true economy.

This is the third year of operation under the act. By June, about 13,000 loans will have been made to tenants. Yet the Farm Security Administration, which administers the act, had received 279,000 applications for tenant-purchase loans up to December 31, 1939. In Alabama, where 576 tenant-purchase loans are to be made, applications were received from 13,521 families, or almost 26 times as many as can get loans under the present limitation of funds.

Some critics have argued that, because we could not make loans to all tenants, we should make none. But other means are being used to help those who do not get loans. The Farm Security Administration's rehabilitation program is increasing the stability and security of farmers who must remain as tenants. They are being helped to initiate sound farming practices that will make it easier to convert them into owners when the money is available.

It is not necessary to make every tenant an owner. On the other hand, I do not believe that 40,000 new tenants each year is healthy for this Nation. If we reduce the number of tenants gradually and meanwhile improve tenure conditions for the others, we will have gone a long way in stabilizing agriculture.

We have made a sound beginning in the farm tenant purchase program. Safeguards to protect the Government's investment have been made with care. Only experienced, capable farmers are eligible for loans. They must be American citizens who have proved their ability to operate a family-sized farm. Those who have accumulated a few tools and some equipment in their years as tenants are given preference by the law. The character and qualifications of every applicant and the value and earning power of the land which he intends to purchase are carefully analyzed by committees of local farmers.

On the other hand, there are also safeguards for the prospective owner. The family-sized farms selected must be able to produce a living for the family and produce enough income to repay the loan. Borrowers have the advantage of being able to repay their loans under a variable-payment system, if they choose. Under this plan borrowers make bigger payments in good years, smaller ones in years of crop failure or low prices. Payments must average out so that principal and interest are retired in 40 years.

With each loan the borrower and his family receive some technical guidance in sound farming methods. The farm wife plans a live-at-home program by canning a sufficient amount of home-grown foods to meet her family needs. The farmer can build up the fertility of his soil through a long-time management plan. He can use crop rotations, permanent pasture, diversified cash crops, and soil-conserving tillage practices, which are impossible for a tenant who stays on a farm for only a year or two. These new owners plan to stay on their farms permanently and they are not going to risk depleting their soil.

The tenants who are becoming farm owners through the Bankhead-Jones loans are accepting their responsibilities. The installments due on these loans last year totaled about $92,000, yet tenant-purchase borrowers repaid $152,000 into the Federal Treasury. In other words, repayments far exceeded maturities. My own State followed this trend, repaying $20,529 when maturities amounted to only $18,402. And I am proud to say that the hard-working farmers in my own district repaid about $300 more than was currently due on their loans.

Yet none of these borrowers were able to get credit for the purchase of a farm from any other source, public or private. Without the help offered through the tenant-purchase program these farmers would have still been on the bottom rung of the agricultural ladder where the 2,000,000 eligible farm families must remain because of a short-sighted attempt at economy. If we provide these tenants with the pride of home ownership, with an individual stake in the soil, we will be taking a real step toward economy and conservation.

That this program is heartily endorsed throughout the country may be shown by the following excerpts from editorials of various papers endorsing it:

EDITORIAL COMMENT ON THE BANKHEAD-JONES FARM TENANT ACT

[From the Atlanta (Ga.) Journal of August 17, 1939]

In other countries, notably in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland, and Ireland, the farm-tenancy problem has been successfully dealt with by methods similar to that embodied in the Bankhead-Jones Act. The plan is sound in conception, and thus far is doing well in practice.

[From the Helena (Ark.) Record of October 19, 1939]

The F. S. A. is making little capitalists, little-business men out of thousands of American farmers. It is stabilizing our democratic, capitalistic society in a place where strengthening has been critically needed.

[From the Prairie Farmer of November 8, 1939]

This attempt by the Government to help solve the problem of too many rented farms and too few owned farms worked by owners was started without much blowing of trumpets. It is growing a little each year. We think that it has the breath of life in it, and as the years go by, will make many farm families happy in the security of their own farm homes.

[From the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press of July 18, 1939]

Any program which will help families to rehabilitate themselves on the land so that they can keep off the relief rolls and get back on a basis of self-support permanently certainly is worth encouraging.

[From the Houston (Tex.) Post of July 21, 1939]

There would seem to be no better long-range plan of coping with the problems of displacement or tenants than this one, which enables the tenants to acquire land of their own, and become independent. Congress will make no mistake by financing the expansion of the operations of the F. S. A.

[From the Mountain View (Ark.) Herald of June 26, 1939]

The Government has already launched a very splendid program designed to give particularly worthy tenants and sharecroppers a chance to achieve ownership. Into this program is established a phase of sympathetic technical help and advisory assistance, designed to give the borrower individual help along the line he needs.

[From the Greenville (S. C.) News of July 13, 1939]

One of the great values, as it has been shown, of the present plan, has been that of supervision by governmental agencies of the purchasing farmer's plans of operation and his consequent adoption of a well-rounded farm program which increases his chances of success. Capable assistance designed to help the farm tenant become a successful manager on his own place, is, after all, the most important basic contribution toward reducing farm tenancy.

[From the Salina (Kans.) Journal of March 20, 1939]

The future of cities in agricultural areas, such as Salina, depends upon the solution of the farm-tenancy problem. Business, in all classifications, should be intensely interested in the progress of and in the broadening of the program.

[From the McComb (Miss.) Journal of July 13, 1939]

So far 7,000 tenants and sharecroppers have been able to finance deals sufficient to buy farms with Government money, repayable over a 40-year period at 3 percent interest. The Government can make no better investment.

[From the Eau Claire (Wis.) Leader of February 12, 1939]

Worthy tenants of St. Croix County, who have been unable to get out of the tenancy class, are finding new hope in the Farm Security Administration's tenant-purchase measure, recently enacted under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, and operating in St. Croix County for the second successive year.

[From the Greenville (Tex.) Banner of June 20, 1939]

There is no doubt about the success of the program. It has been tested and found workable and worthy; in fact, it is one of the most important programs sponsored by the Government. Hunt County likes the program and hopes it will be enlarged in this section.

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State of March 4, 1939]

The soundest American philosophers, from Thomas Jefferson down, have agreed that the only healthy and sure base for a democracy like ours is a great body of small, independent, and successful farmers. If the Federal Government can do anything (and obviously it can do a great deal) to make our small farmers independent and successful it need not blush for the paternalism or the "interference" or even for the money spent. Especially when, in comparison with what has been spent on other Federal projects, the amount is so small.

[From Farm and Ranch for May 1939]

The Farm Security Administration, in its farm-purchasing program, is demonstrating that there are tenants who can become successful owners if given the opportunity.

[From the Hutchinson (Kans.) Herald of July 5, 1939]

We can think of nothing more desirable than to make this a nation of small farm owners and users, independent, debt-free, and contented on the farm.

[From the Jacksonville (Fla.) Times-Union of February 24, 1939]

From every million dollars that goes into the F. S. A. program will come returns greater than multiplied millions poured into other phases of the Federal-relief program generally. So small is the amount set aside for the F. S. A. that only six Florida counties have been designated for loans under the tenant-purchase program.

[From the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune of July 27, 1938]

It is interesting to note that the Danes, over a century ago, revolutionized the rural situation in their country by a similar method of making farm owners out of a tenant population. The percentage of independent farm owners is high in Denmark, largely as a result of a Government system of aiding competent farmers to acquire ownership of productive farm units on easy terms of purchase. If the farm-purchase program is carefully and soundly developed in this country, it may prove a long-range factor in reversing the growing farm tenancy in the United States which has so alarmed observers of rural conditions in the last two decades.

[From the Columbia (S. C.) Record of November 11, 1937]

It appears that for the first time something definite will be done specifically for the farm tenant. And this provides ground for hope. Certainly the sporadic general efforts of the past have not been very effective in reducing high tenancy rates.

[From the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch of July 4, 1938]

It is too early yet to judge the work of the Farm Security Administration, other than to say that it has of necessity had to proceed with desirable caution in making loans to tenants. Those who have gotten loans during the first years of the program have been the outstanding tenant farmers in their counties and are likely to succeed. They will also exert a good influence on farming in their districts.

[From the Martinsburg (W. Va.) Journal of July 1, 1938]

It may well be contended that the surest antidote to a temptation to communized government is to make individuals actual owners of property for, as such, they have respect for the principle of property as it applies both to themselves and to their neighbors.

[From the West Union (Iowa) Union of April 10, 1938]

Apparently, the bulk of opinion of the farmers present believed that barring death, accidents, or ill health, a young farmer receiving a Farm Security Administration loan in Fayette County would own his own place some day. The American spirit of "own the home place" was upheld in several spirited discussions.

[From the Houston (Tex.) Post of July 7, 1938]

The need for helping tenants to get on land of their own appears all the greater today. There would have been less need for relief of other sorts if more had been done to solve the tenancy problem. It is clearly to the advantage of the cities and towns, as well as to the small farmers, to prevent the merging of small farms into larger ones, since mergers of that sort almost invariably reduce the number of farm workers in a given area, cause unemployment, reduce the purchasing power of the population, and curtail general business.

[From the San Francisco (Calif.) Chronicle of January 5, 1940]

One piece of economy in the President's Budget strikes California with dismay. This is the 20-percent cut in the funds of the Farm Security Administration. The Farm Security Administration has been toiling to fix things on the Ozark Plateau and in like regions, so families there would not pick up and migrate to States like California, where relief payments are better. The cut, if it stands, means that Farm Security Administration can do less to stop this flow of migrants and to help those who are here.

[From the Madisonville (Tex.) Meteor of December 7, 1939]

A nation of home owners and of farm-owning farmers is the surest and about the only safeguard for a continuing democracy. If the Farm Security Administration succeeds in picking the right men, and these men live up to their opportunity, America will be the gainer for the money it loans in such a fashion. It's certainly worth trying.

[From the Arkansas Agriculturist for January 1939]

The measure is practically drawn and every effort is being made by Farm Security Administration officials to keep loans as low as possible. For example, full advantage is taken of existing improvements on farms that are bought. In cases where the house on the property is in good condition, the loan covers only enough to do minor repairs and place it in good living condition.

[From the Tishomingo (Okla.) Democrat of January 11, 1940]

The splendid work of the Farm Security Administration in Johnston County in rehabilitation of farmers makes one pause to wonder if the Government has not at last found the proper solution to relief problems by basing aid on a premise of "have" instead of "have not." Other Government relief agencies extend aid only to those who have nothing and continue to extend aid to those who continue to have nothing.

The Farm Security Administration starts farmers out who have nothing and build them up to landowners and fine citizens by helping them to acquire property and encouraging ownership.

[From the Dallas (Tex.) Times-Herald of January 18, 1940]

Walter Collins, Lamar County farmer aided by the Farm Security Administration to farm ownership, has done it again. On January 2 he came to the office in Paris of John D. Cunningham, county F. S. A. supervisor, and became the first farmer in the United States to make his 1940 F. S. A. land payment.

But this is only a third of the story.

Collins, who lives 17 miles northwest of Paris, is now 2 years ahead of his repayment schedule, although the loan is only a year old.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read down to and including line 6 on page 1.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. TERRY] having resumed the chair, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COLE], Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8202, the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOURLY MEETING

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke today may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks previously made, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the course of my remarks a copy of a resolution from the Police Jury of Webster Parish, La., on soil conservation, and a letter of Secretary Henry A. Wallace of the Department of Agriculture on soil conservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include a short table showing a break-down of certain public works by States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD at this point a statement by Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, in a statement issued today, sharply condemned the economy bloc of the House which has slashed Federal farm appropriations for the next fiscal year.

"It appears," the statement said, "that the House Appropriations Committee is determined to economize at the expense of agriculture. I regard this as extremely short-sighted. Agriculture is the keystone in the arch of national recovery, and any reduction in farm income will be multiplied manifold in reduced national income, more unemployment, reduced Federal tax returns, and lowered national morale.

"Congress, in 1933, in 1936, and in 1938, in formulating the major farm legislation of recent years, has, in effect, promised farmers parity prices, but it has never made sufficient appropriations to make parity a reality. Restoration of farm purchasing power is fundamental to national recovery. Congress should increase the farm appropriation to a figure which will make the farm program fully effective, rather than cutting off the prosperity stream at its source, as it is doing now. The recovery that has been made has been due largely to improvement in farm buying power after the dark days of 1933.

"Farm income is still nearly two billions short of parity, which is simply fair exchange value, and economic balance can never be restored until farmers are able to trade their products on a fair basis for the goods and services produced by other groups. Farmers are producing abundantly and selling food and fiber at what amounts to a 27-percent discount.

"For generations farmers have paid the penalty of the tariff on everything they buy. After long years of struggle they at last won from this Government a plan which promised a tariff equivalent which would give agriculture the benefit of the American protective system. Now it seems that the economy bloc of the House proposes to sabotage farm recovery, to nullify the gains that have been made, and to set our basic industry back 20 years. If that is to be the policy of this Congress, then let Congress take the responsibility. The farm bureau will take the fight to the country, and those who are striking at agriculture will have to face their farmer constituents and give an account of their stewardship when they go home.

"Farmers are deeply conscious of the dangers of an unbalanced Budget. They want a balanced Budget, of course, but they believe in balancing it in a constructive way, by taking steps which will raise the national income to a figure at which it can be balanced. That can be done by raising agriculture's income to $12,000,000,000 annually. That much income on farms will generate enough new business to put this country once more into high gear, to strike the most telling blow yet delivered to unemployment, and to give new hope and confidence to a nation whose morale has been sadly weakened in recent years.

"Farmers constitute the greatest mass market for industrial goods in this country, and with this group out of the market, it is folly to expect national recovery. Industry in this country is geared to mass production, and unless you have mass consumption to go along with it, it is bound to fail. If Congress carries out this threat to agriculture, it will be one of the most costly mistakes ever made."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein an editorial from the Daily Argus Leader of South Dakota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a letter from a practical farmer in my district on this agricultural question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I had unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on Wednesday, February 7, at the conclusion of the legislative program. I note on the calendar that a mistake has been made and it indicates that I am to have that 30 minutes today. I ask for the change, and that I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on February 7, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and at the conclusion of the legislative program.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and the regular legislative calendar business, I may be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TENEROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the conclusion of the legislative calendar and any other special orders, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the remarks previously made this afternoon, I ask unanimous consent to insert following those remarks a letter which I have received from Charles J. Leavery regarding the Farm Belt situation, and also an editorial from the Sioux City Tribune regarding the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent in connection with the remarks I made this afternoon and the extension thereof, to include certain tables and articles relating thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the legislative business on Tuesday next and other special orders I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I could not hear what the gentleman whispered.

Mr. McDOWELL. I requested permission to address the House for 20 minutes at the conclusion of the legislative business and special orders on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on Tuesday next at the conclusion of the legislative business for the day and the other special orders that have been entered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CORBETT] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose here to place before the Congress and the people of the United States the burden of the complaint by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against the administration of W. P. A. in that State.

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. The gentleman will have ample time to yield at the end of his remarks. I ask to be not interrupted now.

Early last fall Arthur H. James, the Governor of Pennsylvania, was induced by circumstances to inquire of Col. Phillip Matthews, the State administrator of W. P. A., and Col. Francis C. Harrington, the Federal Administrator, why Pennsylvania was not receiving its full quota of W. P. A. jobs. These inquiries were polite requests for information. Gradually, however, as the correspondence and interviews have continued, and as the Governor and his staff have probed deeper into the whole matter, the Governor has been compelled to make specific and grave charges against the administration of W. P. A. as regards the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. These charges are based on evidence which has been carefully gathered and scrutinized. Certainly the charges and the evidence are such that the Federal and State administrators should feel constrained to do one of two things: Either they should prove the charges to be false or they should promptly admit their degree of validity and correct the situation without any political bickering. This is not a partisan matter, nor any attempt to embarrass anyone. It is plainly a demand that those responsible prove that the people of Pennsylvania are being treated fairly or that immediate steps be taken to provide for fair treatment.

Mr. Speaker, I herewith present the charges referred to, and some of the evidence on which they are based, and I ask each person to decide whether or not they merit an objective and complete answer:

First, it is contended that the quota of W. P. A. jobs allotted to Pennsylvania is too low. Our information indicates that during the administration of Governor Earle, Pennsylvania received approximately 10 percent of all W. P. A. jobs assigned in the Nation, and that currently under the administration of Governor James, Pennsylvania is receiving only 7 percent of all W. P. A. jobs assigned in the Nation. Now, if 10 percent was a fair and proper share in 1938, we wonder why it was not a fair and proper share in 1939, and why it is not a fair and proper share now.

More which is of a cumulative nature will be added on this point as I proceed.

Second, it is charged that the quota of W. P. A. jobs allotted to Pennsylvania has not been filled at any time since Governor James took office. The degree of performance in comparison to the quota provided has, of course, varied from week to week, but never has the quota been surpassed nor equaled. For proof, I will first read at this point the pertinent part of a letter under date of October 2, 1939, written by Governor James to Colonel Matthews:

DEAR COLONEL MATTHEWS: I have your letter of September 29 and I thank you for the reply concerning this important problem of increasing the number of persons on W. P. A. projects about 25,000 to reach your quota of 150,000 which was the quota for September and which you say will be the quota for October.

In your letter, as I understand it, you point out three factors which explain the fact that you are about 25,000 persons under the 150,000 quota.

First, you mention the administrative difficulties within your organization occasioned by the necessity of discharging 65,718 persons who had been continuously employed for 18 months and at the same time having your administrative force reduced 47 percent, all of this required by the congressional act. Under these difficulties the number of persons on W. P. A. projects went down to 117,169, or 32,831 under the quota.

Another part of the letter is very interesting and instructive, and I read it as an illustration of the fact that Pennsylvania has not only cooperated fully with W. P. A., but has done more to be helpful than has been asked.

I appreciate the administrative difficulties under which you have been laboring, and it was for that reason that on August 17, 1939, I informed you that I had appointed a special coordinating committee in order that the State government could give all possible cooperation with your W. P. A., and ever since coming into office I have constantly urged the departments to give full cooperation to the W. P. A. organization.

While I appreciate these difficulties which you have had, I must again point out that this failure to keep up to quota has resulted in a tremendous financial burden being thrown upon the State which rightfully belonged to the Federal Government and deprived thousands of persons of employment. You have fallen below the quota since July, and for the months of July, August, and September, due to the failure to reach the quota, the State has had to pay out in relief funds at least $1,800,000 which burden should have been carried by the Federal Government by employing the full quota of persons it had established.

Up to the present time, the W. P. A. Administrator has listed three reasons other than the one of administrative difficulties just considered as to why Pennsylvania has not received its full quota of jobs. The reasons given are insufficient projects, a shortage of employables on the State relief rolls, and the failure of Philadelphia to participate fully.

Mr. FLANNERY. Has the gentleman taken it up with Colonel Harrington of the W. P. A.?

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall not be able to yield until the conclusion of my remarks only on the ground that there will be ample time if I am not too frequently interrupted.

Mr. McGRANERY rose.

Mr. CORBETT. I informed the gentleman that I would yield at the conclusion of my remarks, so I hope he will just be comfortable and contented.

Mr. FLANNERY. Suppose there is not time?

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. CORBETT. There will be plenty of time, I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLANNERY].

Perhaps it is true that Philadelphia has not participated in W. P. A. work to an extent reasonably to be expected. For purposes of argument we can admit that point, because it is not pertinent. W. P. A. allotments are assigned to the State as a whole, not to subdivisions thereof. If Pennsylvania is assigned 160,000 jobs per month on the basis of the Administrator's careful estimate of the State's need, then Pennsylvania is entitled to 160,000 jobs regardless of whether or not 1 county or 10 counties fail to provide adequate projects. Certainly the money allocated to Pennsylvania should not be returned to the Federal office for distribution in other States. This is true because every man laid off W. P. A. or who W. P. A. fails to provide for is returned to the direct relief rolls of the State and becomes a burden to the taxpayers of the State. For example, if there are 500,000 persons on relief in Pennsylvania, and the W. P. A. promises to provide 160,000 of them with jobs, that would leave 340,000 for the State to furnish with relief checks. Now, if W. P. A. only places 135,000 on its rolls, that means that Pennsylvania must retain the additional 25,000 persons on its relief rolls, making their total 365,000 rather than 340,000. Viewed in this light, is it not obvious that so far as the State budget is concerned it does not make a particle of difference whether a man is on the W. P. A. list in Pittsburgh, Erie, Scranton, or Philadelphia? The important thing is that he be on somewhere, and if Philadelphia does not want the job, that is no reason for penalizing Pennsylvania by giving the job to some other State. The job should go to some other part of Pennsylvania.

Briefly, then, if conscientious determination results in the allocation of 160,000 jobs, regardless of whether Philadelphia, Punkin Center, or Four Corners sponsors any W. P. A. projects or not, Pennsylvania has to carry a load increased to the extent W. P. A. fails to take on its announced quota.

The second alibi can be dealt with more concretely. It is alleged by the administrators that Pennsylvania is not enjoying its full quota because of the lack of available projects. The facts belie this notion. Reports under date of January 15 and 16, 1940, reveal the following facts regarding township projects: There is a shortage of 13,554 workers on projects already started; 9,127 men could be utilized on projects approved but not started, and 7,357 could be put to work on projects awaiting approval. The total of persons who could be assigned to projects located in Pennsylvania townships is accordingly 30,000, or more than the normal shortage in the W. P. A. quota list. But that is not all. Let us look at highway projects, exclusive of township projects, and see what we find. There the reports indicate a shortage of 5,061 on the 728 projects now operating. On 156 other projects approved and waiting for men, 6,999 men are needed to make a total of 12,060 men needed at once. Furthermore, on 167 delayed projects and 355 pending projects, 15,583 men could be given work. Adding the only figures for highway and township projects, and including projects working, approved, and pending, we find a total of 64,700 W. P. A. jobs now available. Surely lack of projects is not a valid reason for the failure to fill Pennsylvania's quota.

Next, let us inquire if the failure is caused by a shortage of employables on the direct relief rolls of the State. Here the story is the same. During the preelection peak of W. P. A. employment in Pennsylvania, which occurred during October and November of 1938, W. P. A. found jobs for 275,000 employables on relief in Pennsylvania. During October of 1939 they infer that only 133,000 employables could be found on the relief rolls in Pennsylvania and that therefore the then existing quota of 150,000 W. P. A. jobs could not be filled. Here I would like to again quote from Governor James' letter to Colonel Matthews. On October 2, 1939, he wrote the following, which is still illustrative:

DEAR COLONEL MATTHEWS: * * * The department of public assistance, by your own statement, has certified 186,969 persons to W. P. A. as of September 20, 1939, as available for employment. You mention that only 97,681 of the 186,969 persons are available for assignment. I wish you would explain what has become of the 89,288 which you are not including as available for employment.

In the accompanying table, I am showing the number of persons certified by counties, and only in 8 counties does the number of certified persons fall below 100, yet you mention 28 counties. Again, I should like to know where the missing persons are.

The tables referred to in the letter reveal a total of 186,969 persons on the State direct relief rolls who were certified as eligible for W. P. A. jobs. Certainly lack of employables on relief is not a valid reason for Pennsylvania being short-changed on its W. P. A. quota.

Now, if lack of projects is not the reason, if lack of men is not the reason, and if the Philadelphia situation can be discounted, what is the reason why Pennsylvania day after day, week after week, and month after month has to provide direct relief for varying thousands who, according to the W. P. A. Administrator's own quota, should be given W. P. A. jobs? We do not know the reason, and therefore we are here today asking for the reason, if Pennsylvania is assigned 160,000 jobs per month, why does not Pennsylvania get 160,000 jobs per month? And while we are asking questions, we would like to know also why Pennsylvania was only assigned 150,000 jobs up until December and why she is only assigned 160,000 jobs at present? We have allowed for the cut in the general Federal program, and we still contend that under a fair formula Pennsylvania would get considerably more than 150,000 or 160,000 jobs.

And, by the way, Colonel Harrington today announced an increase of 5,000 in the quota allotment for Pennsylvania.

Pennsylvania has paid out upward of $25,000,000, according to the Governor's staff, in the form of direct-relief checks to persons who might have under the quota been assigned to W. P. A. On the average Pennsylvania is carrying, according to the same authority, about 67 percent of the total cost of relief in its own State, while few if any other States are paying over 47 percent of their own relief costs. Such a situation appears to be unfair and Pennsylvania asks that it either be satisfactorily explained or satisfactorily corrected.

I hope that our good friends on the Democratic side will join us in performing a service to thousands of Pennsylvanians.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. McGRANERY. Do I understand the gentleman to say—first of all, I would like to make the observation that it is regrettable that only 10 Members listened to the gentleman's speech, exclusive of himself—however, do I understand the gentleman to say that Philadelphia was not to be counted in this State set-up?

Mr. CORBETT. No. The gentleman understood me to say that for purposes of argument we would admit what was said about the Philadelphia situation, and we admit it on the grounds that it is not pertinent.

Mr. McGRANERY. The gentleman admits that in the city of Philadelphia there are 15,000 that could be employed from W. P. A. if the Republican administration would pay its sponsors' contribution?

Mr. CORBETT. I made no such admission. I used no figure and did not use the words "Republican" or "Democrat."

Mr. McGRANERY. Does the gentleman deny the fact that 15,000 people can be employed on W. P. A. in Philadelphia?

Mr. CORBETT. If the gentleman's question will be fairly put, I will answer. We are trying to understand a problem.

Mr. McGRANERY. I will give the right figure. Does the gentleman deny that 20,000 people could be employed on W. P. A. if the municipal government there would sponsor the project and pay the contribution?

Mr. CORBETT. The gentleman deserves an answer on that point. Keeping close to the argument as it was being presented, I said that the situation regarding Philadelphia was not pertinent.

Mr. McGRANERY. Let me ask this question.

Mr. CORBETT. Let me finish the answer to one question, please. Because of the simple fact that we are here concerned with seeing to it that Pennsylvania's entire quota is filled up. Regarding the local situation in Philadelphia, since the election of a Republican mayor, $1,000,000 has now been set aside to sponsor local W. P. A. projects. What has been true under the administration of Mayor Wilson I neither seek to explain nor apologize for. However, I want you to get this fact from my speech which you did not pay close attention to.

Mr. McGRANERY. The gentleman does not think so. Wait until he hears this.

Mr. CORBETT. Simply the fact that the jobs which might have gone into Philadelphia County were taken away from Pennsylvania and given to other States, while on the basis of figures I will introduce next week, you will see that county after county in the State of Pennsylvania was ignored.

Mr. McGRANERY. Let me correct the gentleman.

Mr. McDOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McGRANERY. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I now yield to my colleague. When he has completed his question, I will yield to the gentleman again.

Mr. McGRANERY. I want to say to the gentleman there has always been a Republican mayor in Philadelphia.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. McDOWELL. I did not know there were 20,000 that could be employed. May I inquire, has the gentleman's voice been raised before this for those 20,000?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McGRANERY. My voice has always been raised.

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be accorded 5 additional minutes to answer questions.

Mr. CORBETT. If the gentleman will modify his request to 3 minutes, I shall not object.

Mr. FLANNERY. I amend it to 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLANNERY]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDOWELL] to finish his statement.

Mr. McDOWELL. This will be very brief and informative. I did not know this. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania tell me if he has knowledge of any new additions to the W. P. A. in the Pennsylvania ranks since, say, last Thursday?

Mr. CORBETT. There has been a rather considerable increase in the number allotted—a 5,000 increase for W. P. A., plus the men who work on the projects now confirmed.

Mr. McGRANERY. Will the gentleman advise the House as to the organization set-up of W. P. A. in Pennsylvania with respect to whether or not there is a distribution over areas? Are there particular areas? How is this allotment in Pennsylvania distributed?

Mr. CORBETT. That will take some time to explain.

Mr. McGRANERY. I will ask for more time.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not have the time.

Mr. McGRANERY. Does the gentleman know how it is set up?

Mr. CORBETT. Yes; and I will explain it in considerable detail say on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week.

Mr. FLANNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLANNERY. Is it not a fact that in each instance when the W. P. A. appropriation bills were on the floor of this House for consideration the distinguished gentleman voted to cut the Presidential and Mr. Harrington's estimate? I ask the gentleman, Is that correct or incorrect?

Mr. CORBETT. Did the gentleman consult the RECORD on that?

Mr. FLANNERY. I ask the gentleman on his honor. I do not check the RECORD when I ask him. I asked him if he voted to cut the Presidential estimate.

Mr. CORBETT. I honestly would like to check that.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I can answer that question.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. FLANNERY. Does the gentleman know whether or not he voted to cut the Presidential estimates?

Mr. CORBETT. I voted for the figure of $725,000,000, which was under the Presidential request at that time. Let us get the full story. On the next deficiency appropriation I voted for the total of $125,000,000, which altogether was only $25,000,000 short of the request which was made for the entire fiscal year.

Mr. FLANNERY. Then the gentleman did not have to consult the RECORD, and it is a fact that in each instance he voted to cut the Presidential estimate?

Mr. CORBETT. Not in each instance.

Mr. FLANNERY. Yes; in each instance. The gentleman has just stated that.

Mr. CORBETT. The total picture of my W. P. A. vote for the last year was $25,000,000 under the Presidential estimate.

Mr. FLANNERY. Has the gentleman consulted Mr. Harrington with reference to these estimates?

Mr. CORBETT. May I ask a question? What do these questions or what does my vote have to do with whether or not Pennsylvania is getting a fair share of these jobs? Is not the gentleman interested in that?

Mr. FLANNERY. They have to do with the gentleman's sincerity with regard to the amount of money available for the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot question the sincerity of another Member of the House.

Mr. FLANNERY. I withdraw my statement, Mr. Speaker, and apologize to the gentleman.

Let me rephrase my question.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNERY. Did the gentleman consult Colonel Harrington about the conditions he has described here? The gentleman says he is asking for reasons. Will the gentleman please explain? Did the gentleman personally consult Colonel Harrington?

Mr. CORBETT. Indirectly through the office of Senator DAVIS, which letter and answer I have in part, and through the office of the Governor. That is all. The gentleman's question is answered.

Mr. FLANNERY. Why evade the question?

Mr. CORBETT. I did not evade it.

Mr. FLANNERY. Did the gentleman personally consult Colonel Harrington and ask these questions and ask for reasons and explanations?

Mr. CORBETT. I felt that in view of my Governor and my Senator having done that it was not necessary that I also should do it.

Mr. FLANNERY. In other words, the gentleman did not do it?

Mr. CORBETT. I did not.

Mr. FLANNERY. It does not seem fair to attack a man without consulting him.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I never attacked, or in any way in my remarks said anything personal about Colonel Harrington, Colonel Matthews, or any other individual.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGRANERY. The gentleman has stated what he calls charges against the administration of W. P. A. and its treatment of Pennsylvania. He said we have these employables there, and that they could go on W. P. A. I say to the gentleman that he does not have to go to Colonel Harrington; he does not have to go any farther than right here, and he will find out why. The answer is that the sponsor's contribution has not been met by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. We have up there right now an approved project.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRANERY. I am afraid I cannot yield.

We have a project up there on the upper Schuylkill River in which there is waiting for W. P. A. in Pennsylvania $1,250,000 if the State of Pennsylvania but puts up $125,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania said that the reason these W. P. A. jobs were not filled was because of lack of funds for local sponsorship, yet I read to him figures pointing out that on projects already started, on township projects, there are now available 13,554 jobs, and on projects already started on the highways there are now available openings for 5,061 men. In other words, if the projects are already started and the vacancies exist, surely the localities must have put up the money.

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CORBETT. I yield.

Mr. FLANNERY. It seems that the gentleman has not taken into account the fact that many of these projects are in remote areas, and the State has not afforded transportation. [Here the gavel fell.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PITTENGER (at the request of Mr. KUNKEL), for today and tomorrow, on account of official business.

To Mr. SATTERFIELD (at the request of Mr. BLAND), for today, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. SASSER, for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

To Mr. LANHAM (at the request of Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON), for today, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, February 1, 1940, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1940

The Chaplain, Rev. Zeb Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and compassionate Father, whose unsleeping care is over all Thy works, whose love passeth knowledge, whose mercy drives away despair: We turn to Thee at this morning hour, before we undertake the duties of another day, because apart from Thee we find neither light, nor rest, nor strength. We come in our weakness, but Thou knowest our frame and pitiest our frailties, for Thou hast made us. We are ashamed for our failures; we chafe at our limitations; we fret within the chains of sin, and long to be free. So, like dwellers on the heated plains who lift their eyes to distant hills, we lift our hearts to Thee, the Pure and Holy. Receive us and forgive, shelter us under Thy wings, and hide us in Thy heart of love that shall one day gather every wanderer home. We ask it in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS

The Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on official business for the Special Committee on Civil Liberties.

Mr. McNARY. I announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHY] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

SENATOR FROM IDAHO—CREDENTIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the credentials of JOHN THOMAS, designated by the Governor of Idaho a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. William E. Borah, which were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

STATE OF IDAHO,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Boise.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Idaho, I, C. A. Bottolfson, the Governor of said State, do hereby appoint Hon. JOHN THOMAS, of Gooding, Idaho, a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein caused by the death of Senator William E. Borah, of Boise, Idaho, is filled by election, as provided by law.

Witness: His excellency our Governor, C. A. Bottolfson, and our seal hereto affixed at Boise, Idaho, this 27th day of January, A. D. 1940.

By the Governor:

C. A. BOTTOLFSSEN, Governor.

[SEAL]

GEO. H. CURTIS, Secretary of State.

PROGRAM FOR CONSTRUCTION OF SMALL HOSPITALS (H. DOC. NO. 604)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

To the Congress of the United States:

In my special message to the Congress on January 23, 1939, I expressed my concern over the inequalities that exist among the States as to health services and resources with which to furnish such services. With that message I transmitted the report and recommendations on national health prepared by the interdepartmental committee to coordinate health and welfare activities, and recommended it for careful study by the Congress.

Conditions described a year ago are substantially unchanged today. There is still need for the Federal Government to participate in strengthening and increasing the health security of the Nation. Therefore, I am glad to know that a committee of the Congress has already begun a careful study of health legislation. It is my hope that such study will be continued actively during the present session, looking toward constructive action at the next. I have asked the interdepartmental committee to coordinate health and welfare activities to continue its studies.

In order that at least a beginning may be made I now propose, for the consideration of the Congress, a program for the construction of small hospitals in needy areas of the country, especially in rural areas, not now provided with them. Hospitals are essential to physicians in giving modern medical service to the people. In many areas present hospital facilities are almost nonexistent. The most elementary health needs are not being met.

The provision of hospitals in the areas to which I refer will greatly improve existing health services, attract competent doctors and raise the standards of medical care in these communities. The new hospitals should serve the additional purpose of providing laboratory and other diagnostic facilities for the use of local physicians, as well as accommodations for local health departments.

The proposed hospitals should be built only where they are most needed; they should not be constructed in communities where public or private institutions are already available to the people in need of service even if these institutions are not up to the highest standards. To insure proper location and good standards of operation, approval of hospital construction projects should be given by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, with the advice of an advisory council consisting of outstanding medical and scientific authorities who are expert in matters relating to hospital and other public-health services.

Projects proposed for consideration should be submitted by responsible public authorities and should include assurance that adequate maintenance will be provided. Approval of projects should be preceded by careful survey of existing local hospital facilities and needs. Standards for organization, staff, and continuing operation should be established by the Surgeon General, with the advice of the advisory council. A competent hospital staff and satisfactory standards of service should be required, including medical, surgical, and maternity service. When indicated, special provisions should be made for the care of the tuberculous. In many areas of the South, the present acute needs for the care of Negro patients should also be met.

I suggest that these hospitals be simple, functional structures, utilizing inexpensive materials and construction methods. The facilities of the Federal Works Agency should be utilized in the planning and execution of the hospital projects. Title to these institutions should be held by the Federal Government, but operation should be a local financial responsibility.

I recommend to the Congress that enabling legislation for this program be enacted and that a sum of between $7,500,000 and $10,000,000 be appropriated to the Public Health Service to inaugurate the program during the next fiscal year.

I am confident that even this limited undertaking will bring substantial returns in the saving of lives, rehabilitation of workers, and increased health and vigor of the people.

This suggestion is not a renewal of a public-works program through the method of grants in aid. The areas which I have in mind are areas so poor that they cannot raise their share of the cost of building and equipping a hospital. Yet I believe that many of such communities have enough public-spirited citizens with means, and enough citizens able to pay something for hospital treatment, to care for operating costs of a hospital, provided they do not have to pay for its original construction and equipment, or to pay annual interest and amortization on borrowed money. Treatment in such a hospital would, of course, be available to men, women, and children who literally can afford to contribute little or nothing toward their treatment.

One of the important difficulties in such areas at the present time is that young doctors hesitate to practice general medicine or surgery because of the utter lack of hospital or laboratory facilities. One cannot blame them.

In such areas, also, costs of construction are generally low and many local materials can be used. It is my belief that, with the assistance of the Work Projects Administration, the cost of building and equipping a hundred-bed hospital can be kept down to between $150,000 and $200,000. This means that we could build 50 such hospitals for between $7,500,000 and $10,000,000.

This is not an ambitious project. This principle should not be extended to Government gifts to communities which are financially able to build their own hospitals. It is an experiment in the sense that the Nation will gain much experience by undertaking such a project.

At the very least it will save lives and improve health in those parts of the Nation which need this most and can afford it least.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 30, 1940.

TEMPORARY NATIONAL ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] a member, on the part of the Senate, of the Temporary National Economic Committee, created by Public Resolution 113, approved June 16, 1938, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. William E. Borah, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

FUTURE ADJUSTMENT IN ACCOUNTS OF THE UNITED STATES TREASURER

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize certain future adjustments in the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States when erroneous payments have been made by him in good faith and without negligence, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

CONTRACTS EXEMPTED BY SECRETARY OF THE NAVY FROM PROFIT LIMITATION

REPORT OF CAPITAL TRANSIT CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the President of the Capital Transit Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report covering the operations of the Capital Transit Co. for the calendar year 1939, with balance sheet as of December 31, 1939, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF THE CHESAPEAKE & POTOMAC TELEPHONE CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate letters from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement of receipts and expenditures, and a comparative general balance sheet of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. for the year 1939, which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate letters from The Archivist of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, lists of papers and documents on the files of the Departments of the Treasury, the Navy, the Interior, Agriculture, Labor, and the General Accounting Office, which are not needed in the conduct of business and have no permanent value or historical interest, and requesting action looking to their disposition, which, with the accompanying papers, were referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. GIBSON members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from the resolutions committee of the Grafton-Sullivan Forest Fire Warden's Association, Hanover, N. H., praying for an increased appropriation covering fire hazard reduction work during the fiscal year 1940-41 in the State of New Hampshire, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by the council and mayor of the city of Quincy, Mass., favoring the enactment of legislation to remedy conditions in connection with compulsory lay-offs under the existing W. P. A. law, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Wichita Automobile Association, of Wichita, Kans., favoring amendment of the so-called Wagner Labor Relations Act so as to provide adequate protection for automobile retailers and their employees and similar groups, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

AID FOR FINLAND

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my State an organization exists known as the Nordic Committee for Finnish Relief. I have received a communication in behalf of the committee from its officers—Mr. C. H. Carlquist, chairman; Mr. Holger M. Larsen, secretary; and Mr. Lawrence A. Johnson, treasurer. The communication which I have received contains a formal request, directed to the members of the Utah delegation in Congress, that the delegation to "do everything possible to have the United States support Finland short of actually engaging in war." The communication further states that the committee consists of 25 representatives—5 from each—Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, and Iceland. The communication further states that at a gathering in one of the large halls of Salt Lake City more than 2,000 persons were in attendance, at which a number of addresses were delivered urging that the United States Government "should at least grant Finland a loan without 'any strings or conditions.'" The communication further states that the members of the organization, from their contacts with the people generally, are convinced—

That an overwhelming majority of the citizens of Utah favor something very constructive being done in the way of assisting Finland, and think that an outright gift, large enough to enable them to make successful resistance, is the right course to be pursued.

The further statement is made:

This desire is based upon the fact that Finland is fighting for us as well as for herself in restraining the encroachments of Stalin and his communistic government.

With the letter is a statement addressed to the Congress, which reads as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of Utah, feeling deeply the absolute necessity of the United States' assistance to Finland in every way possible within the keeping of our neutrality laws, hereby beg of you to do everything within your power as our Congressmen to provide unlimited aid to Finland. We resent the attitude of some Members of Congress who have apparently taken an ostrichlike attitude at this serious time, as though the people of our beloved United States did not have any responsibility in supporting other democracies in their attacks by aggressor nations. We feel that the United States has an important stake in the present situation; and inasmuch as the little nation of Finland has conducted herself with honor in her dealings with the United States, therefore our Nation should wholeheartedly support Finland in her defense of democratic and Christian civilization. This assistance should be tendered in a concrete form and not only in sympathetic words.

I ask that this statement, which is signed by several hundred persons, be inserted in the RECORD, and that it, together with the signatures, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. The names of several hundred members of the organization referred to are attached to the statement, and my information is that many more citizens of Utah and members of the organization referred to would have been glad to affix their signatures to the statement. I ask that the statement with the names attached thereto be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. I avail myself of this opportunity to add a few remarks.

As Senators know, there are in the United States a large number of citizens of Scandinavian origin. They are among the most patriotic and enlightened citizens of this Republic. Within the State of Utah there are several hundred thousand persons who were either born in the Scandinavian countries or are their descendants. There are also some residents of the State who are of Finnish origin. I am glad to have the opportunity of paying tribute to the important contributions which have been made to the building of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent by those who came from the Scandinavian countries, including Finland, and their descendants. There are no better citizens to be found in this Republic than those residents of my State, as well as other States, who trace their origin to the Scandinavian countries.

In every field of endeavor they have demonstrated those fine qualities which make for a high degree of civilization. The residents of my State who have come from the countries referred to are leaders in every branch of industry and in every important activity. They have taken high rank in all cultural fields as well as in all branches of trade, industry, commerce, and agriculture. They have been among the foremost in every line of industry, trade, commerce, and movements that have made for the development of the Commonwealth. They have set examples of thrift and courage and energy and enterprise that have given to them positions of leadership in every part of the State. In art, music, and literature they have been outstanding, and in educational and religious and spiritual spheres their leadership has been accorded universal recognition. They are, in every sense of the word, patriotic American citizens; they are devoted to constitutional government and to the maintenance of those principles of liberty and justice for which this Republic stands.

I respectfully request that the views expressed in the statement which I have read are not only entitled to consideration but should have weight with the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, as well as to all Members of the Senate.

FEDERAL HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and myself, I introduce and send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill which was prepared to implement the program announced today in the message from the President of the United States. With the bill there is an explanatory statement which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3230) to promote the national health and welfare through appropriation of funds for the construction of hospitals was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor; and the explanatory statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

This bill is drafted to implement the program of Federal hospital construction outlined in the President's recent message. It is the first step in the development of the rounded national-health program now under consideration in Congress, growing out of the report and recommendations of the Interdepartmental Committee to Coordinate Health and Welfare Activities, transmitted in the President's message on health security about a year ago.

The bill authorizes the appropriation of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, for the purpose of assisting States, counties, health or hospital districts, and other political subdivisions in providing better health and medical services through needed hospital facilities in rural communities and economically depressed areas. The term "hospital" is defined in the act to include physical facilities for the prevention, diagnosis, or treatment of disease, and for the protection of the public health.

Administration of the program is vested in the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service. Localities desiring to participate in the benefits contemplated by the legislation must show that additional hospital facilities are needed, and must give satisfactory assurances that such hospitals will be available to the public under appropriate conditions, will be maintained in good repair, and will be utilized in furnishing services according to sound professional and personnel standards, as defined in regulations to be prescribed.

The actual construction work will be carried on by the Federal Works Agency. Title to the hospitals constructed will remain in the Federal Government. As contemplated in the President's plan, the localities leasing the hospitals must carry the full responsibility and burden of current operations, subject to necessary standards. The Federal Security Administrator is authorized to accept, on behalf of the United States, gifts of money, equipment, and land to be utilized in carrying out the purposes of the program.

The administration of the program will be guided by a national advisory hospital council, consisting of the Surgeon General as chairman, and six members selected by him from leading medical or scientific authorities, who are outstanding in matters pertaining to hospital and other public-health services.

The council is authorized to advise the Surgeon General in reviewing applications for Federal hospitals, recommending needed projects, formulating appropriate professional standards and rules and regulations, reviewing reports, and making inspections with reference to professional services and standards of maintenance.

As outlined in the President's message, this program is frankly an experimental one, designed to fill immediately the most pressing health needs of the Nation and to gain valuable experience while congressional studies of a broader program go forward actively during the present session.

A bill (S. 3230) to promote the national health and welfare through appropriation of funds for the construction of hospitals

Be it resolved, etc., That this act may be cited as the National Hospital Act of 1940.

Sec. 2. For the purpose of assisting States, counties, health or hospital districts, and other political subdivisions of the States in providing better health and medical services through the provision of needed hospital facilities to serve rural communities and economically depressed areas, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, the sum of $10,000,000 and for each fiscal year thereafter such sums as the Congress may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act. Amounts appropriated under this act shall be available until expended.

Sec. 3. States, counties, cities, other political subdivisions or parts thereof alone or in combination wishing to participate in the benefits contemplated by this act shall make application to the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service (hereinafter referred to as the Surgeon General). Said applications shall contain information necessary to establish the existence of need for hospitals, to give assurance acceptable to the Surgeon General that such hospitals will be made available under appropriate conditions to all groups of the population, will be maintained in good repair, and will be utilized in furnishing service of satisfactory quality, in accordance with regulations hereinafter authorized to be prescribed.

SEC. 4. There is hereby established the National Advisory Hospital Council (hereinafter referred to as the "Council") to consist of the Surgeon General as chairman and six members to be appointed by the Surgeon General with the approval of the Federal Security Administrator. The six appointed members shall be selected from leading medical or scientific authorities who are outstanding in matters pertaining to hospital and other public-health services. Each appointed member shall hold office for a term of 3 years except that (1) any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term, and (2) the terms of office of the members first taking office shall expire, as designated by the Surgeon General at the time of appointment, two at the end of the first year, two at the end of the second year, and two at the end of the third year after the date of the first meeting of the Council. No appointed member shall be eligible to serve continuously for more than 3 years but shall be eligible for reappointment if he has not served as a member of the Council at any time within 12 months immediately preceding his reappointment. Each appointed member shall receive compensation at the rate of $25 per day during the time spent in attending meetings of the Council and for the time devoted to official business of the Council under this act, and actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses while away from his place of residence upon official business under this act.

SEC. 5. The Council is authorized to advise the Surgeon General with reference to the carrying out of the provisions of this act, including—

(a) The review of applications for hospitals submitted in accordance with and meeting the requirements of section 2 and recommendation of such projects as in its opinion are needed, will be adequately maintained, and otherwise will fulfill the requirements of this act.

(b) The formulation of standards which are necessary to insure proper conduct of the hospitals and care of persons served by the hospitals.

(c) The formulation of rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(d) The review of reports and inspections, and, when necessary, the making of inspections, with reference to professional service and standards of maintenance of the hospitals.

SEC. 6. In carrying out the purposes of this act the Surgeon General is authorized and directed, after consultation with the council—

(a) To conduct, assist, and foster studies and surveys with respect to needs for hospitalization and problems of hospital operation;

(b) To approve hospital projects, to designate the location, type, equipment, and size of hospitals, and to allocate available funds to such approved projects;

(c) To provide training and instruction of personnel who will be required in connection with the hospitals;

(d) To cooperate with State and local health and welfare authorities and with professional agencies;

(e) To secure reports and to make inspections with respect to professional service and standards of maintenance of the hospitals and other matters pertinent to carrying out the purposes of this act;

(f) To adopt such additional means as may be found necessary or appropriate to carry out the provisions of this act, including the safeguarding of the quality of service furnished in hospitals;

(g) To make, with the approval of the Federal Security Administrator, such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act; and

(h) To lease hospital projects when completed to the applicant for an indefinite period, the consideration for such lease being the maintenance and operation of said hospital in accordance with the provisions of this act; if at any time said maintenance and operation by the applicant shall fail to meet such provisions, the lease shall be terminated by the Surgeon General on 6 months' notice.

SEC. 7. When a hospital project has been approved by the Surgeon General, in accordance with the provisions of this act, it shall be certified by the Federal Security Administrator to the Federal Works Agency for construction and there shall be allocated and transferred to the Federal Works Agency, out of funds appropriated pursuant to this act, so much of the appropriation as may be determined to be available for the project, and the Federal Works Agency is authorized to expend such sums for the planning, execution, and construction of the project and pertinent facilities, including administrative expenses, site acquisition, the preparation of working drawings and specifications, award of all necessary contracts and supervision of construction; and the Federal Works Agency is further authorized to expend out of appropriations available to it in accordance with the purposes thereof, such sums as may be necessary for the completion of the project, but without regard to specific limitations imposed on the use thereof. Title to the properties so constructed, and to the equipment installed therein, and to the land upon which they are located, shall be in the United States.

SEC. 8. The Federal Security Administrator is authorized to accept on behalf of the United States gifts of money, equipment, and land to be utilized in carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 9. The President is authorized to allocate from funds appropriated pursuant to this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, a sum for all necessary expenses of the Public Health Service in administering the provisions of this act, including the training of personnel; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated in each succeeding fiscal year such amounts as the Congress may deem necessary for such purpose.

SEC. 10. (a) There is hereby authorized to be appointed in the Public Health Service, in accordance with applicable law, such additional commissioned officers and other personnel as may be necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act.

(b) On recommendation of the Surgeon General, the Federal Security Administrator shall submit to the Bureau of the Budget on or before September 15 of each year a list of approved hospital projects under this act and cost estimates thereof, together with such other data as may be necessary for the preparation of the Budget estimates.

(c) This act shall not be construed as superseding or limiting (1) the functions, under any other act, of the Public Health Service or any other agency of the United States relating to the prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of disease; or (2) the expenditure of money therefor.

(d) The term "State" as used in this act shall include also the territories and insular possessions of the United States.

(e) The term "hospital" as used in this act shall include the physical facilities necessary for the prevention, diagnosis, or treatment of disease, and for the protection of the public health.

(f) The Surgeon General shall include in his annual report for transmission to Congress a full report of the administration of the act, including a detailed statement of receipts and disbursements.

(g) This act shall take effect 30 days after the date of its enactment.

ABOLITION OF UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to abolish the United States Tariff Commission and to create in its place a Foreign Trade Board, which shall gather together all of the powers and functions now scattered through 50 different departments and bureaus in relation to the promotion of foreign trade and the protection of domestic industry, agriculture, and labor.

I have prepared a brief statement outlining the proposal. I ask that the statement be printed at this point in the RECORD and that the bill be referred to the Finance Committee.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3238) to abolish the United States Tariff Commission, to create a Foreign Trade Board, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance; and the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT PREPARED BY MR. VANDENBERG

I have introduced a bill to create a new independent agency of the Government to be known as the Foreign Trade Board. Speaking generally, it seeks to create full protection for American agriculture, industry, and labor in our relations with other countries through the establishment of a responsible and efficient agency to deal with foreign commercial and financial activities as distinguished from the diplomatic and political activities traditionally conducted by the State Department. It seeks to bring the full, constructive force of government to bear upon all phases of foreign-trade promotion while, at the same time, constantly gearing these efforts to the best welfare of our own domestic economy. It unifies these efforts which are now scattered, in one form or another, through 50 different bureaus and departments of Federal Government. It seeks to create authority, now substantially lacking, to record and control international financial transactions which are just as intimately related to our foreign and domestic economy as are commodity transactions. It seeks to provide practical machinery for keeping our tariffs in constant adjustment to competitive American costs of production, without the necessity of general tariff revisions. This method of handling the problem suggests an answer to those who insist that there is no middle ground between congressional logrolling and the Hull trade-agreements program in a practical and effective answer to the related problems. The advantages of such a Foreign Trade Board are strongly suggested by the success of the British Board of Trade over many decades in meeting the ever-changing conditions and problems of world trade in peace and war alike. There is no pretense that the bill is wholly perfected to meet all necessities. But the text is provided for constructive consideration and debate.

The existing United States Tariff Commission is abolished and all of its functions are transferred to the new Foreign Trade Board. The President is authorized to gather up all the other loose powers dealing with foreign trade and to concentrate them in this new authority. The board would have power to control imports for the purpose of protecting our domestic economy. It would have power to encourage exports through barter agreements and otherwise. It would have power to lower tariffs, as well as to increase them, under explicit congressional criteria. It would have power to take direct action in connection with the troublesome problem of blocked exchange. It would, for the first time, bring into Government possession authentic information regarding transactions in foreign exchange, in the export or import of securities, and in the export or import of gold and silver coin, bullion, or currency. It would be charged with the responsibility of coordinating our foreign trade and financial statistics in order that we may have a true picture of our relationship with each country in the world. Thus facts could take precedence over theories in the conduct of our commercial and financial activities with other countries.

Such an agency is necessary if we shall realistically meet world-trade conditions. It will be doubly necessary in post-war periods of readjustment. All of the principal nations of the world have already abandoned most of the methods previously employed in world trade. New and radically different methods already are in vogue. These nations have resorted to unilateral actions, such as exchange controls, quotas, embargoes, and other export and import controls, and they have extended such arrangements through a constantly growing network of exclusive, bilateral agreements, most of which leave our interests entirely out in the cold. It is not enough to say that these things are all wrong. We must cope with these realities by equipping ourselves to meet these conditions which are not likely to pass in our time. Furthermore, it is vital that our foreign-trade policy should be consistent within itself and should not present a constant quarrel between different policies pursued by different branches of the same Government.

Such an agency should operate as an independent agency and on a parity with other executive departments. It should be subject only to the general direction of the President and the Congress. It should not be subordinated to the State Department, because the latter specializes in political and diplomatic contacts and is not equipped or intended to deal with problems of commerce and finance which must be handled on a basis of domestic need. The Foreign Trade Board must be composed of men who are thoroughly experienced with all phases of our domestic economy, representing all political parties, all geographical sections and all national interests and activities, so that, as a whole, it may speak authentically for all America. So far as possible the Board should aspire to as detached and independent a status, in respect to foreign trade, as the Interstate Commerce Commission in respect to domestic transportation. The entire objective is to implement our commercial and financial transactions with other nations on the most effective basis of trade promotion and trade control in the light of necessary protection for domestic trade and commerce.

HOSPITAL LOANS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I am today introducing a bill for appropriate reference which provides for an effective construction program aimed at the improvement of hospital and sanitation facilities throughout the Nation. I wish to observe at the outset that my bill will in no wise conflict with a similar bill introduced by my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. It will supplement the program he proposes, and it will permit applicants who otherwise would not be permitted to apply for funds for this purpose to qualify, and, in the end, to build hospital facilities.

I am making this proposal after some careful thought and survey of hospital and sanitation needs throughout the country. I have in mind the construction, equipment, repair, alteration, extension, and improvement of hospitals, water and sewage systems, and works for the reduction of pollutions in our streams.

In view of the essential requirements of hundreds of municipalities which are not in a position to finance such projects themselves, in view of the growing realization that the Nation's health is of major contemporary concern, in view of the need for long-term, low-interest financing in instances where private financing agencies cannot assume the task, in view of the need for continued stimulation of the heavy durable-goods industries, in view of employment requirements both in the skilled and unskilled fields, and in view of the liquidation in the near future of the existing P. W. A. program, which will throw additional hundreds of thousands out of gainful occupation, this proposed legislation appeals to me to be both necessary and timely.

Mr. President, let me point out that this is a modest, conservative proposal. It does not provide for public grants. Every cent that is loaned for this worth-while type of construction will be repaid to the United States Treasury.

The bill is restricted to 100-percent loans for a limited field of construction. It calls for long-term loans—as long as 50 years at 2-percent interest. It calls for an appropriation of $300,000,000, of which $100,000,000 shall be wholly devoted to hospital projects.

Mr. President, the construction of hospitals and the construction of sewage-disposal plants for the purification of our water systems is, in my judgment, of the utmost and immediate importance.

Loans will be made to public bodies and, in the case of hospitals, to nonprofit organizations. This means that privately owned and operated nonprofit institutions, such as those operated by religious, fraternal, or educational organizations, which have heretofore been denied Federal public-works assistance, will have an opportunity to benefit under the provisions of the bill.

This proposal carries careful definitions of the type of construction to be undertaken, and it carefully defines the eligibility of applicants. From the standpoint of community health this is an important piece of legislation. From an economic standpoint I consider it most essential. It is a pared proposal as compared with the Mead-Starnes bill, which was rejected last year by the Senate by the closest of margins.

Employment and community requirements will, I believe, commend this measure to the public. It will be administered by the Federal Works Agency and will involve no permanent financial burden on the Government. Aimed at the construction of permanent, self-liquidating, essential projects, this hospital and sanitation facility building program dovetails into other suggestions that are being advanced to protect and to improve the Nation's health.

Mr. President, I trust this matter will have the attention of the Senate. In view of the liquidation of the Public Works Administration and its program, I believe, it is essential and necessary for us to give consideration, and, yes, approval of this matter at this time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MEAD. I yield to the distinguished leader.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sure I need not call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senate has twice passed a stream pollution bill providing for grants in aid and loans to States, municipalities, and other subdivisions, and to private industries, to enable them to put in sewage-disposal plants and other facilities for the purification of our streams.

Mr. President, in my judgment there is nothing more important for the conservation of the health of our people than to enter upon a program of that sort. A bill providing for such a program passed the Senate, and went to the House and is now on the House Calendar, with a rule already ordered by the Committee on Rules for its consideration, and I sincerely hope that the House will at a very early date consider that bill. There are differences of opinion among ardent advocates of legislation providing for elimination of stream pollution as to the best way to bring it about. There has arisen, for instance, the question whether there ought to be any grants in aid even to public corporations or cities. We are seeking now to work out a plan by which long-term loans may be made at low rates of interest by reason of which the communities involved will obtain in the long run as much benefit as if they received a grant outright of one-third of the cost of the total cost of the project.

Mr. President, I appreciate the interest of the Senator from New York in that phase of his program, as well as the other phases of it, and I think we are well on the way toward the enactment of some legislation at this session with respect to elimination of stream pollution.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I recognize the merit in the proposal which the Senator has so ably sponsored in the Senate, at least during my short service in it, and both in the committee and on the floor of the House I was very happy to give the Senator's proposal my hearty cooperation and support. I recognize in the approval given to that proposal, as well as the approval given by this body to other important public-health measures, the possibilities of favorable approval of the measure introduced by me which is aimed at improving the national health. It will also facilitate the passage of other meritorious proposals, such as that just outlined by the distinguished leader of the majority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD] will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The bill (S. 3246) to authorize loans to public bodies and nonprofit organizations for hospital, water, sewer, stream pollution control, and related projects and facilities, and making an appropriation therefor, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

EMPLOYEES ON MILITARY CONSTRUCTION WORK, PANAMA CANAL ZONE—AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3130) relating to the citizenship and compensation of certain employees on military construction work in the Panama Canal Zone, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INDIAN LANDS AND RESOURCES—AMENDMENT

Mr. GURNEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2103) to repeal the act entitled "An act to conserve and develop Indian lands and resources; to extend to Indians the right to form business and other organizations; to establish a credit system for Indians; to grant certain rights of home rule to Indians; to provide for vocational education for Indians; and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1934, and the act of June 15, 1935, supplementary thereto, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. HOLMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7922) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 77, line 16, to insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of oleomargarine or butter substitutes except for cooking purposes."

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR BORAH

Mr. CLARK of Idaho submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 223), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of Hon. William E. Borah, late a Senator from the State of Idaho, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

REPORT ON THE NATCHEZ TRACE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day which will be stated.

The resolution (S. Res. 222 submitted by Mr. BILBO on the 29th ultimo) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the report of a survey of the Old Indian Trail, known as the Natchez Trace, which was made pursuant to an act approved May 21, 1934, with a view of constructing a national road on this route to be known as the Natchez Trace Parkway.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] spoke to me about the resolution. I think the subject matter is of historical importance, and I hope the resolution will be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH JAPAN

[Mr. SLATTERY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to him by Quincy Wright on the subject of trade relations with Japan, which appears in the Appendix.]

JAPANESE-AMERICAN RELATIONSHIPS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the delicate questions involved in Japanese-American relationships, since the abrogation a few days ago of our treaty of 1911, are so important that there should be the least possible confusion of thought on the subject. The President's notice of abrogation was immediately preceded by my own resolution of last July 18 pointing to the same action. In his syndicated column 2 days ago, Mr. Walter Lippmann, a distinguished and thoughtful journalist, put great emphasis upon the contents and the purport of that resolution in its bearing upon the current crisis. In many aspects, I am sorry to say, that he misinterpreted what I believed then and believe now to be the intent and the objective of the resolution and the abrogation is proposed. I do not complain. It is purely an honest difference of opinion. But I think it so important that his interpretation should not go unchallenged—since they bear directly upon the present Japanese relations—that I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point the original Lippmann article and a copy of my letter to Mr. Lippmann in reply.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The article and letter are as follows:

[From the Washington Post of January 30, 1940]

TODAY AND TOMORROW
(By Walter Lippmann)

THE SERIOUSNESS OF THE FAR EASTERN QUESTION

Our relations with Japan are now in a very much more serious condition than the majority of Congress or of the people at large seem as yet to have realized. No one can afford to use big words about it.

But the fact is that the issue which has caused the termination of our treaty relations with Japan is more serious, because it is more difficult to settle peaceably, than any issue which has arisen in our foreign relations for 25 years.

The situation in which we now find ourselves was precipitated by a resolution introduced by Senator VANDENBERG on July 18 last. This resolution was referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Senator Borah was then the ranking Republican member of the committee, and among others on the committee were Senators HIRAM JOHNSON, CAPPER, LA FOLLETTE, and SHIPSTEAD. Senator NYE was not a member. But it is highly relevant to note that Mr. VANDENBERG is his candidate for President. It is, therefore, clear beyond dispute that the Vandenberg resolution cannot be ascribed to British propaganda or to an intrigue by the President "to involve us in other people's wars" in order to obtain a third term. The Vandenberg resolution was offered by a leading member of the Foreign Relations Committee; it was referred to that committee in the very week when Senator VANDENBERG and his associates on that committee voted to table repeal of the arms embargo and revision of the neutrality laws.

A canvass of the committee showed that it favored the sense of the Vandenberg resolution, and so, acting on the initiative of the Republican isolationists, the State Department served notice on Japan that at the end of 6 months the treaty of 1911 would end. Though on virtually every other matter in domestic or foreign policy there was at the time fierce opposition to the President, on this matter there was no objection, indeed there was universal nonpartisan support. Yet the Vandenberg resolution was the longest step on the road to war that the United States has taken since President Wilson announced in 1915 that he would hold the German Government to strict accountability for its acts.

Interpreted as step toward embargo

The terms of the Vandenberg resolution and the circumstances in which it was offered must, therefore, be studied, now that the country is face to face with the actual consequences of the resolution. It declares that "the United States should give Japan the 6 months' notice required by the treaty of 1911 for its abrogation." Why? "So that the Government of the United States may be free to deal with Japan in the formulation of a new treaty and in the protection of American interests as new necessities may require." Everywhere in the world this was taken to mean that the United States was making itself legally free to impose an embargo against Japan and, though there seems to be some doubt whether Mr. VANDENBERG himself had this in mind, no important voice was raised at the time to deny this interpretation of the resolution. It did not mean that the United States would impose an embargo, it did mean that the United States could impose an embargo.

But that is not the whole of the Vandenberg resolution. It contains a second paragraph which, considering Mr. VANDENBERG's isolationist theories, is really most curious. The Senator asked that "the Conference of Brussels of 1937, now in recess, should be reassembled." The Conference of Brussels was attended by the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, China, the Netherlands, Belgium, and Portugal. These powers, says the Vandenberg resolution, should meet to "determine, pursuant to the Nine Power Treaty of Washington of 1922, whether Japan has been and is violating said treaty and to recommend the appropriate course to be pursued by the signatories."

Conference was to uphold treaty

This was a remarkable proposal. It was made, let us remember, at a time when Japan was still bound up with Germany in the so-called anti-Comintern Pact. The United States was to join with six European powers, not including Germany and Russia, and with one greatly interested Asiatic power, namely, China, in passing judgment upon Japan. This international group was then to recommend "the appropriate course to be pursued," if Japan was found guilty. It is plain that by the words "appropriate course," Senator VANDENBERG cannot have meant that the conference should condone Japan's violation of the Nine Power Treaty; his firm language can mean only that the conference was to uphold the treaty, and by something more than the use of words.

Yet at the time when Senator VANDENBERG introduced the resolution, which brought about the termination of our treaty relations with Japan, the European members of his proposed conference were known to be on the brink of a European war. That fact must have been known to Senator VANDENBERG. Yet he proposed to invite Great Britain and France (but not Germany) to join with the United States in judging Japan and in recommending a course of action. But also, at the very moment when Senator VANDENBERG was calling upon these European powers to help us deal with the Far Eastern problem, he was devoting his great eloquence and mighty influence to deny them the right to purchase arms by preventing the repeal of the arms embargo.

Thus he was asking the European Allies to join us in challenging Japan in the Far East while he was telling the people here that it made no vital difference to them if the Allies were defeated in Europe. He was asking the United States to engage in collective action against Japan in the Pacific while he was willing to take the risk of injuring fatally in the Atlantic his proposed partners in the collective action.

Mental confusion at home is danger

Thinking of this character is what makes so very serious the Far Eastern situation that the Vandenberg resolution has precipitated. This profound mental confusion at home, and not the wiles of foreign propagandists or the strength of our potential opponents abroad, is our real danger. For it has caused us to challenge a great power, as the Vandenberg resolution challenges Japan, without calculating the consequences of taking account of the cost or considering how the challenge can be made good.

There are many in Washington who even today have not realized what it means to end our treaty relations with Japan in order to force Japan, on the theory of the Vandenberg resolution, to retreat from China. They do not seem to have grasped the fact that this is a frontal challenge to a great power on an issue which that power regards as so vital that it has gone to war about it. But they can measure the seriousness of the challenge when they recall that Great Britain and France are at war with Germany because they insist that Hitler shall give up in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Austria what we are asking Japan to give up in China.

It would be a great mistake to assume that Japan will retreat because we apply an increasing economic pressure. To rely on that solution is to fall into that most dangerous of all errors, to underestimate the strength of an opponent. On the contrary, it would be folly not to realize that the Japanese can resort to more and more desperate expedients as their situation becomes more and more desperate. As a matter of fact, they have already indicated how they are likely to respond to our pressure. They will not try to challenge us directly. They will recoup their prestige and compensate themselves for their losses by measures directed against other nations, against those very nations which Senator VANDENBERG in his resolution wished to call to our assistance.

Japan intensifies action in China

Thus the Japanese have replied to the psychological blow of the treaty abrogation by intensifying their assault on the British at Tien-Tsin. As we tighten the screws, they will intensify their actions against the French supply lines to free China. They will in all probability try to come to terms with Soviet Russia for a partition of China. And if Hitler attacks the Netherlands, they are not likely for long to leave untouched the almost undefended Netherlands Indies.

The Japanese will, in other words, seek to destroy the power of our potential partners in the Far East. They will ally themselves with the nations in Europe which are at war with our potential partners in the Far East. They will strike not at us but at our friends. And their object will be, while avoiding war with the United States, to isolate us completely and put us in a position where we must accept their supremacy in the western Pacific or fight them alone under extremely difficult conditions. For they know that if the Allies can be driven out of the Far East and defeated or made helpless in Europe, then the United States will be quite unable with any force it can command to uphold its interests in both oceans at once.

Senator VANDENBERG was quite right last July when he saw that the Far Eastern question cannot be settled without the participation of the European powers. He was much more profoundly right than he himself has as yet begun to realize.

JANUARY 30, 1940.

MR. WALTER LIPPMANN,

1525 Thirty-fifth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LIPPMANN: You do me the undeserved honor of devoting your syndicated column this morning to a discussion of my Senate resolution of last July 18—calling for an abrogation of our 1911 treaty with Japan and for the reference of the Nine Power Treaty problem to the Brussels Conference. You proceed on the theory that my resolution "precipitated the situation in which we now find ourselves" because the State Department acted upon the favorable sentiment in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee toward the resolution. This is historically inaccurate. The committee rejected my resolution. The State Department's action followed immediately upon the heels of this rejection. It is of no particular moment as regards the problem itself. I simply wish to disclaim the theory that the President and the State Department were controlled by my initiative.

But this leaves for discussion the far more important matters respecting Jap-American relations to which you advert. You correctly emphasize the danger of "mental confusion" upon the subject. I know you would not consciously contribute to this "confusion." Yet that may unhappily be the result of many of your references to my Senate resolution of July 18 and my own attitudes and purposes, if I may be allowed very respectfully to say so. At any rate, I know you will welcome my own viewpoint respecting these references in order "to keep the record straight."

You say "the Vandenberg resolution was the longest step on the road to war since 1915." It was nothing of the sort—unless the incident of abrogation be needlessly used to precipitate a breach and a crisis which the resolution itself explicitly sought to avoid through its demand for a new treaty. It is historically necessary to remember that the Senate was being urged last July by important administration Senators to clamp a one-sided embargo on Japan then and there. That would have violated the treaty of 1911 and distinctly would have been "the longest step to war since 1915." My resolution was an alternative. It was relatively a pacific alternative. It was so intended. It so stated within its own preamble. It opened the way to precisely this result.

You say "everywhere in the world the resolution (which you constantly confuse with the administration's own independent abrogation notice) was taken to mean that the United States was making itself legally free to impose an embargo against Japan; and, though there seems to be some doubt whether Mr. VANDENBERG himself had this in mind, no important voice was raised to deny this interpretation." There is no doubt that the notice of abrogation legally freed us to apply a one-sided embargo. Probably no "important voice"—as "importance" is appropriately rated—denied it. But if the "voice" of the author of the resolution has any "importance," it was constantly and insistently raised against any such automatic purpose or prospectus.

You say the theory of the resolution was "to force Japan to retreat from China." Any such "theory" is denied by the text of the resolution itself which sought two things: (1) the formulation of a new treaty; (2) the protection of American interests "as new necessities may require." Whatever our sympathies may be, and whatever our sense of deep outrage over the conquest of China, our official responsibility, as a matter of foreign policy, is not "to force Japan to retreat from China"; it is to protect American interests. And that was the stated purpose of my resolution.

You say that the resolution, as interpreted by you, "is a frontal challenge to a great power," and must be viewed with this seriousness. I say that the resolution, as interpreted by itself, was a serious effort to avoid any necessity of challenge that might lead to war. I repeat it was the alternative to a one-sided embargo which, then and now, would be "a frontal challenge to a great power."

The purpose of the author of the resolution may be inconsequential. But in view of the importance which you inexplicably attribute to the authorship, it may help to "keep the record straight" to quote from a letter which I wrote Secretary of State Hull on August 7, 1939:

"I do not need to tell you that I have a particularly intimate interest in developments that follow your notice to Japan—regarding the abrogation of the Treaty of 1911—following as it did a resolution to this effect which I presented in the Senate. You are, of course, in no sense obligated to observe the text of my Senate resolution which preceded your action. But I take the liberty of pointing out that the resolution asserted the desirability of this abrogation for the purpose of enacting a new treaty with Japan in the light of 1939 realities.

"I want to take the liberty of making it plain that my own theory of abrogation is definitely predicated upon earnest efforts to agree upon a new engagement. I do not need to tell you that I would not be interested in a mere arbitrary prelude to a subsequent one-sided embargo. If such an embargo ultimately becomes indispensable to the adequate protection of legitimate American interests and rights in the Far East, and if the American people are ever deliberately and consciously ready to take what might thus be the first step toward war itself, we can meet that situation when the issue is unavoidably precipitated. I am writing this letter simply to state my own conviction that any such sinister step is not 'unavoidably necessary' unless and until we have exhausted every pacific recourse. Therefore, it is my prayerful hope that our own Government may promptly indicate to the Government of Japan that we are prepared and anxious to negotiate a new treaty of commerce and amity between the United States and Japan for the purpose of resolving—if possible—any controversy between us affecting American interests. It seems to me that Japan's response to a good-faith effort of this character on the part of the United States will authentically determine whether Japan is prepared to deal justly with us in the perpetuation of mutually friendly and helpful relationships. Holding this view, I shall greatly appreciate it if I may be kept advised from time to time regarding any developments along these lines which I may appropriately be permitted to know about."

I have repeated these sentiments several times in subsequent letters to the State Department. They concede that your interpretation of my resolution could be made. I freely concede that it has been made. But I resist the conclusion that it must be made. The purpose of the resolution was not to precipitate an embargo; it was to avoid an embargo—to avoid it through the realistic negotiation of a new commercial and political treaty with Japan which should amicably settle the question of American rights in Japan and China. I continue to believe this is possible if Japan takes adequate cognizance of our legitimate interests and if we recognize that the Far East of 1940 is not the Far East of 1911. I continue to believe that a rational agreement is possible unless statemanship is bankrupt at one end of the line or the other. I continue to oppose—except as a last resort—any one-sided embargo against Japan which in truth would be "the longest step on the road to war since 1915." This is not an expression of fear. It is an expression of prudence. It is not remotely a surrender to Japan. It is a surrender to common sense—but, of course, the surrender must be reciprocal. We may come to an embargo—and Japan is ill advised if it ignores this hazard. But we have not reached "the last resort" until we have exhausted every reasonable effort to write a new treaty as proposed by the Vandenberg resolution of July 18, 1939.

Now I come to the second part of your discussion—namely, the resolution's call for the submission of the question of Japan's violations of the Nine Power Pact to a renewed meeting of the Brussels Conference of 1937 which was then and still is in impotent recess.

You say "this was a remarkable proposal." If it was "remarkable," then the Nine Power Pact was "remarkable," because this was the precise procedure written into the pact itself for dealing with violations of the pact.

You say that by this proposal I invited Great Britain and France to join in "judging Japan." I did nothing of the sort. I invited the nine powers involved in the pact to read their own pact and to do what their own pact required under such circumstances. It is well, once more, to remember the alternative which was then urged—namely, that the United States should police the Nine Power Pact solely and alone upon its own responsibility. I was opposed to any such policing then and I am opposed to it now. If it is policed, it should be policed by all concerned and in the fashion which the Nine Power Pact itself prescribes. That is what the Brussels Conference was—and still is—for.

You say that while I was thus "calling upon European powers for help," I was supporting an arms embargo which would impair their ability to help. I was not "calling for help." I was "calling" for a recognition of all and not just part of the Nine Power Pact. It has nothing to do with the arms embargo—unless the inference is that we must not expect these European powers to abide by their engagements unless we arm them to do it. I reject any such hypothesis.

You further labor this arms embargo issue by gratuitously adding that, because I favored the arms embargo, I was "telling the people here that it made no vital difference to them if the Allies were defeated in Europe." I told them nothing of the sort. I told them that they must be neutral in their public policies and that they must keep out of this war themselves because it would make a vital difference to them if they drifted into a war from which they probably would come in political and fiscal bankruptcy despite their victory. I have never said the outcome in Europe makes no difference to us. It does make a tremendous difference. My feelings are well known and unequivocal. But it makes a still greater difference, in my humble opinion, if we are drawn into war—and I propose to continue to combat that hazard to the last honorable limit.

I beg your indulgence for this long analysis. It could not be shorter and parallel your own discussion. I am sure you will understand that I am writing in no spirit of complaint. I am sure you know my great respect for your opinions. But since you have assigned me to a place of such undue prominence in our far-eastern policies, I have felt it incumbent upon me to point out, chapter and verse, wherein I deeply dissent from some of your comments and conclusions.

With warm personal regards and best wishes,

Cordially and faithfully,

(Signed) ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I should like to say that while I probably disagree with the Senator from Michigan upon the general question involved, in view of the background behind the resolution submitted by the Senator from Michigan, I felt, in reading the article by Mr. Lippmann the other morning, that it was extremely unfair to the Senator from Michigan and completely misstated the actual facts, probably without any intention upon Mr. Lippmann's part.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his observation.

CENSUS QUESTIONNAIRES

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I desire at this time to take 4 or 5 minutes to read a letter to a department head in the form of a petition. The letter is addressed to Hon. Harry L. Hopkins, Secretary of Commerce, and is as follows:

HON. HARRY L. HOPKINS,
Secretary of Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

JANUARY 31, 1940.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: My attention has been called to the questionnaires which have been prepared by the Bureau of the Census, both for the population schedule and the census of housing, and I cannot reconcile some of the questions which will be asked of the householders of this country with the natural right of privacy of the individual and further with the authority granted by law.

In addition, in the light of evidence found by the Sheppard Investigating Committee in the matter of the W. P. A. scandal, I feel that there is real danger to our individual citizens in forcing them under threat of a penalty of imprisonment to divulge to the politically appointed individuals who are seeking this information facts concerning the individual citizens' financial indebtedness.

In the first place, it is noted that each individual called upon by the census takers will be forced, under threat of penalty of fine and imprisonment, to answer more than 80 questions, this ordeal alone being sufficient to give the normal housewife at least a slight suggestion of a headache. In the Sheppard report of the committee investigation into the W. P. A. scandal the official W. P. A. records were not kept in confidence; but in the State of Kentucky, for example, lists of all W. P. A. workers were copied from the official records in forms with a column left for "remarks." These forms were mimeographed on official W. P. A. stationery and copies handed to the W. P. A. foremen to have them filled out with the political affiliation of the relief worker and whether or not, in the opinion of the foreman, the person so checked was favorable to the candidacy of the Democratic incumbent who was running for reelection. In many instances it was found that men not in favor of this candidate were discharged and denied relief.

Referring to the 1940 census, there has been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of a letter addressed by a Member of the Senate to an applicant for census work, which stated that the applicant should secure the endorsement of her Democratic ward and precinct committeeman indicating that the census takers who call from door to door will be members of one political party and, in most cases, loyal party workers. I understand that those who call from door to door will be local residents of the community. Therefore, it will be most embarrassing to the individual, and a severe hardship, to require him, as you do, under the questionnaire, to tell his neighbor, who is taking the census, what salary he is receiving and whether he has received income of $50 or more from sources other than money, wages, or salary.

In view of the W. P. A. scandal, there are grounds for being apprehensive lest these politically appointed census takers reveal this information to their political bosses and lest the political bosses take political advantage of the financial plight of the individual citizen. Further ground for this apprehension is based upon the fact that the owner of a private home is required, under the terms of the questionnaire, to reveal to his politically appointed neighbor, whether or not his home is mortgaged, and, if so, the amount of the mortgage, how regularly he is making payments on his mortgage, and whether the mortgage is held by an individual or business concern.

I am advised that the National Census of Housing Act of 1939 incorporates the provisions of the National Census Act of June 18, 1929. The latter act stipulates that the census "shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to irrigation, to drainage, to distribution, to employment, and to mines." The scope of these inquiries was enlarged in the National Census of Housing Act of 1939 to include "information concerning number, characteristics (including utilities and equipment) and geographical distribution of dwelling structures and dwelling units in the United States." The restriction placed by Congress on the inquiries would seem in all reason to call for an application of the universally accepted maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius."

Is it not rather anomalous that in this enlightened age, when the right to privacy in the individual has made such great strides, that the Government should step in and put a halt to that progress? This innate love of freedom in the individual is not the only deterrent in refusals to answer questions of this kind. The individual is entitled to a certain amount of self-respect. Why should he be compelled to divulge the amount of his income to political appointees who may reside in his neighborhood, who may be his next-door neighbor, in fact, or even an enemy. He is justifiably loath to furnishing such information to any Tom, Dick, and Harry who has been given, by a political boss, the privilege to intrude. Besides the convictions which have been inculcated in him, besides his self-respect, which is commendable, he may have an additional cause for refusing to answer some of these questions.

Would anyone be willing to say that his feeling that such evidence might be used against him by certain interested parties was altogether unwarranted?

Were I told that such a method of compulsion was used to elicit private information in Soviet Russia or in Germany prior to, and to facilitate, the inauguration of dictators in those countries, I would not be at all surprised. In this day of impermanence in governments, in this age of "social planning," when disastrous inroads in the liberties of the individual are perpetrated in the name of greater efficiency, a questionnaire of this kind is, to say the least, untimely. Such a departure from precedent under the guise of social planning reminds one of Professor Tugwell's words: "We begin with small unnoticed changes and end by not being able to resist vast and spectacular ones."

To compel a citizen of the United States to furnish facts about his private affairs, as above referred to, is a policy which endangers the rights of the individual and, under the restrictions placed by the Congress, it appears to me to be entirely unjustified.

I, therefore, am writing to ask that you advise me as to the disposition of the Department in this matter in light of the objections which I have raised.

Very truly yours,

CHAS. W. TOBEY.

Mr. President, I now exhibit to the Senate 1 of the sheets to be used by census enumerators. The sheet embodies 50 questions and is almost large enough to use as a blanket for a baby. With it also is the housing questionnaire, containing 31 additional questions, so there is a grand total of 81 questions. There is not a census enumerator, no matter how skilled he may be, who can go to a housewife and propound those questions and get satisfactory answers in less than an hour or an hour and a half. And for that we are paying $8,000,000.

Mr. President, I decry the Federal Government seeking to pry into the affairs of individuals in this great inquisitorial and snooping campaign. Common sense and true Americanism rise up and cry, "Hold, enough!"

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair expresses the hope that the occupants of the galleries will observe the rules of the Senate.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask that the questions appearing on these questionnaires be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Location:

1. Street, avenue, road, etc.
2. House number (in cities and towns).

Household data:

3. Number of household in order of visitation.
4. Home owned (O) or rented (R).
5. Value of home, if owned, or monthly rental, if rented.
6. Does this household live on a farm? (Yes or no.)

Name:

7. Name of each person whose usual place of residence on April 1, 1940, was in this household.

Be sure to include: 1. Persons temporarily absent from household. Write "Ab" after names of such persons.
2. Children under 1 year of age. Write "Infant" if child has not been given a first name. Enter X after name of person furnishing information.

Relation:

8. Relationship of this person to the head of the household, as wife, daughter, father, mother-in-law, grandson, lodger, lodger's wife, servant, hired hand, etc.

Personal description:

9. Sex—Male (M), female (F).
10. Color or race.
11. Age at last birthday.
12. Marital status—Single (S), married (M), widowed (Wd), divorced (D).

Education:

13. Attended school or college any time since March 1, 1940? (Yes or no.)
14. Highest grade of school completed.

Place of birth:

15. If born in the United States, give State, Territory, or possession.
If foreign-born, give country in which birthplace was situated on January 1, 1937.
Distinguish Canada-French from Canada-English and Irish Free State (Eire) from Northern Ireland.

Citizenship:

16. Citizenship of the foreign-born.

Residence, April 1, 1935:

In what place did this person live on April 1, 1935?

For a person who, on April 1, 1935, was living in the same house as at present, enter in column 17, "Same house," and for one living in a different house but in the same city or town, enter "Same place," leaving columns 18, 19, and 20 blank in both instances.

For a person who lived in a different place, enter city or town, county, and State, as directed in the instructions. (Enter actual place of residence, which may differ from mail address.)

17. City, town, or village having 2,500 or more inhabitants.

Enter "R" for all other places.

18. County.

19. State (or Territory or foreign country).

20. On a farm? (Yes or no.)

Persons 14 years old and over—employment status:

21. Was this person at work for pay or profit in private or nonemergency Government work during week of March 24-30? (Yes or no.)

22. If not, was he at work on, or assigned to, public emergency work (W. P. A., N. Y. A., C. C. C., etc.) during week of March 24-30? (Yes or no.)

If neither at work nor assigned to public emergency work. ("No" in columns 21 and 22.)

23. Was this person seeking work? (Yes or no.)

24. If not seeking work, did he have a job, business, etc.? (Yes or no.)

For persons answering "No" to questions 21, 22, 23, and 24.

25. Indicate whether engaged in home housework (H), in school (S), unable to work (U), or other (Ot).

If at private or nonemergency Government work. ("Yes" in column 21.)

26. Number of hours worked during week of March 24-30, 1940.

If seeking work or assigned to public emergency work. ("Yes" in column 22 or 23.)

27. Duration of unemployment up to March 30, 1940—in weeks.

Occupation, industry, and class of worker:

For a person at work, assigned to public emergency work, or with a job ("Yes" in column 21, 22, or 24), enter present occupation, industry, and class of worker.

For a person seeking work ("Yes" in column 23): (a) If he has previous work experience, enter last occupation, industry, and class of worker; or (b) if he does not have previous work experience, enter "New worker" in column 28, and leave columns 29 and 30 blank.

28. Occupation: Trade, profession, or particular kind of work, as frame spinner, salesman, laborer, rivet heater, music teacher.

29. Industry: Industry or business, as cotton mill, retail grocery, farm, shipyard, public school.

30. Class of worker.

31. Number of weeks worked in 1939 (equivalent full-time weeks).

Income in 1939 (12 months ending December 31, 1939):

32. Amount of money, wages, or salary received (including commissions).

33. Did this person receive income of $50 or more from sources other than money, wages, or salary? (Yes or no.)

34. Number of farm schedule.

SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTIONS FOR PERSONS ENUMERATED ON LINES 55 AND 68

35. Name.

For persons of all ages:

Place of birth of father and mother:

If born in the United States, give State, Territory, or possession. If foreign-born, give country in which birthplace was situated on January 1, 1937. Distinguish Canada-French from Canada-English and Irish Free State (Eire) from Northern Ireland.

36. Father.

37. Mother.

Mother tongue (or native language):

38. Language spoken in home in earliest childhood.

Veterans:

Is this person a veteran of the United States military forces; or the wife, widow, or under-18-year-old child of a veteran?

39. If so, enter "Yes."

40. If child, is veteran-father dead? (Yes or No.)

41. War or military service.

For persons 14 years old and over:

Social security:

42. Does this person have a Federal social-security number? (Yes or No.)

43. Were deductions for Federal old-age insurance or railroad retirement made from this person's wages or salary in 1939? (Yes or No.)

44. If so, were deductions made from (1) all, (2) one-half or more, (3) part, but less than half, of wages or salary?

Usual occupation, industry, and class of worker:

Enter that occupation which the person regards as his usual occupation and at which he is physically able to work. If the person is unable to determine this, enter that occupation at which he has worked longest during the past 10 years and at which he is physically able to work. Enter also usual industry and usual class of worker.

For a person without previous work experience, enter "None" in column 45 and leave columns 46 and 47 blank.

45. Usual occupation.

46. Usual industry.

47. Usual class of worker.

For all women who are or have been married:

48. Has this woman been married more than once? (Yes or No.)

49. Age at first marriage.

50. Number of children ever born. (Do not include stillbirths.)

Census of housing, 1940; preliminary list of inquiries

- Ee. Type of holder of first mortgage or land contract: Building and loan association, commercial bank, savings bank, life-insurance company, mortgage company, H. O. L. C., individual, other.

INVESTIGATION RELATIVE TO WIRE TAPPING AND LISTENING DEVICES

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I am today submitting a resolution directing the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate to make a full and complete investigation of communication services so far as they relate to wire tapping.

It seems proper for me to make a short statement as to why I have presented today this resolution directing the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce to make an investigation of communication services so far as they relate to wire tapping, or the use of dictographs, and to report its finding to the Senate with its recommendation for the enactment of any remedial legislation it may deem necessary. I am doing this at this time because of the activities of a detective agency in New York State which has sent into Rhode Island, eastern Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, and perhaps elsewhere, its agents to tap the wires of elected public officials and private citizens holding responsible positions in the political and business world.

Within the last 3 months it has been ascertained that the telephone wires leading to the home of the mayor of one of the largest cities in my State have been tapped, and also the wires leading to the home and to the State office and to the private law office of the attorney general of Rhode Island. These detectives have, it is reported, traveled back and forth between New York and these other places, living lavishly at hotels and in private homes while working at this business, and some of them are former Federal Government employees who were discharged from the agencies for which they formerly worked. One of them has stated that he was a member of the United States Naval Intelligence while he was working in Rhode Island.

I am informed that besides tapping wires these agents have preyed upon responsible businessmen. In one case, I understand, they assured a citizen of my State that his application for a broadcasting license could be obtained from the Federal Communications Commission for a consideration. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Commission.

I am also informed that the Department of Justice is at the present time investigating their activities, and that the United States district attorney in Rhode Island will soon present his case to the Federal grand jury.

The scandal has been widespread and has attracted much attention. A special assistant to the attorney general of my State, who, it is reported, was recommended to the attorney general by the Governor of Rhode Island, has been discharged from his office by the attorney general because he refused to inform his superior of his transactions with this detective agency.

The United States district attorney of Rhode Island has stated that the tapping of a telephone line, even in intrastate communications, is a violation of section 605 of the Federal Communications Act, provided the substance, purport, or contents of the intercepted message are made known to any person not authorized by the sender to receive the information; also that section 601 provides a penalty for such interception and divulgence, and that whether or not the substance, purport, or contents of such a message were made known, it would be a criminal offense, under the laws of the United States, for two or more persons to conspire together to tap telephone lines, intending to use the information thus obtained.

Gov. Herbert H. Lehman, of New York, in his eighth annual message to the legislature of that State, on January 3 of this year, dwelt upon wire tapping, and his reference to it is as follows:

RIGHT OF PRIVACY

A short while ago the Supreme Court of the United States repeated that wire tapping is dirty business. Particularly at this juncture in history have we reason to be keenly grateful for this decision. I for one greet with profound satisfaction the reaffirmation of the principle that a citizen's privacy in a democracy is sacred and must not be invaded without just cause.

I believe that democratic government cannot with either propriety or safety infringe its own basic law. I fought for that principle during the constitutional convention and at the last session. I shall go on fighting for it.

Law enforcement is, of course, a serious duty. But we defeat the desired end if we do not insist that our tools of law enforcement be used honestly, fairly, and without oppression.

Surely this is not a question on which Republican Party leaders should continue to differ with Democratic Party leaders. This is a simple and fundamental question. We should all agree upon preserving the sanctity of our Bill of Rights. You and I can all appreciate that faith in democracy is bound to be impaired if solemn constitutional guaranties are lightly repudiated.

It is my strong conviction that we should by law prohibit the use of evidence stealthily obtained in direct violation of the Constitution. Penalties should be provided for those who ruthlessly invade a citizen's privacy either by improper wire tapping or unlawful searches and seizures. Any other course, as the United States Supreme Court recently said, is "inconsistent with ethical standards and destructive of personal liberty."

What Governor Lehman has said to the Legislature of New York might well be said to the legislatures of other States.

The people not only of the States I have named, but of the country at large, are interested in knowing whether or not public or private funds were used and furnished this detective agency or other agencies to send investigators to the different States to interrupt and tap the communication services of elected public officials. I believe the public is also interested in having Congress pass laws which would prevent persons traveling in intrastate commerce for the purpose of violating any Federal law, including that of wire tapping.

I feel confident that a committee investigating along the lines set forth in this resolution will recommend legislation which will outlaw wire tapping and other despicable practices of this kind.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Does the Senator know for whom this detective agency is acting?

Mr. GREEN. I cannot say that I know, but I have very good reason to suspect for whom it is acting.

Mr. MINTON. Would the Senator feel like telling us?

Mr. GREEN. No; I think it inadvisable to name any names.

Mr. MINTON. It would not be connected with any political organization, would it?

Mr. GREEN. It might be.

Mr. MINTON. Of course, if it were, in the spirit of the junior Senator from New Hampshire, I say, "Hold! Enough!"

The resolution (S. Res. 224, submitted by Mr. GREEN) was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of alleged instances of (1) interception, by means of wire tapping or otherwise, of wire communications to or from officials and employees of the Federal, State, and local governments, and (2) installation of dictographs or similar devices for the purpose of listening to or recording conversations participated in by such officials and employees. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation for the enactment of any remedial legislation it may deem necessary.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-sixth and succeeding Congresses, to employ and to call upon the executive departments for clerical and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Routine morning business is concluded. The calendar under rule VIII is now in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider unobjectioned-to bills on the calendar, beginning with the number following the final measure considered on the last call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I favor that procedure. Since the request is made for the purpose of getting the matter before the Senate, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will consider measures on the calendar beginning with order of business No. 1197, House bill 6124.

THE GOVERNMENT'S GOLD AND SILVER PURCHASING POLICY

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to occupy just a few moments of the time of the Senate, and I request that I may make my remarks without interruption.

Since last the Senate met, the newspapers have been carrying stories emanating from the Treasury and criticizing the speech on gold and silver which I delivered before the Del-Mar-Va Press Association on January 27.

Senators can get an idea of the nature of the Treasury's criticism of my speech from the newspaper headlines. Let me read a couple of them.

On January 30 the New York Times carried a Washington dispatch headed:

Morgenthau Denies Aid to Russia on Gold—Senator TOWNSEND's Charge Is Ridiculous, Secretary Says.

In presenting the Associated Press account of Mr. Morgenthau's criticism of my speech, the Washington Evening Star on January 30 carried a headline reading:

Morgenthau Answers Gold Purchase Critic.

Specifically, the Associated Press reporter wrote, in part, as follows:

Asked at his press conference whether the Treasury might discriminate against some gold sources in the future, the Secretary said:

"I doubt it."

He added he had never been able to get accurate figures of Russian gold production, but said it was ridiculous to assume that all of the Russian production was sold to the United States.

The New York Times reporter in his January 29 dispatch from Washington referred to the Secretary of the Treasury's statement, in part, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 29.—Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr., said today it was ridiculous to say that the Treasury had been aiding Soviet Russia by purchasing Soviet gold.

The Washington Times-Herald of the same day, January 30, in a story by John Fisher, similarly quoted the Secretary directly as saying that my statement on Russian gold was ridiculous.

These are just sample excerpts from a statement which the Secretary gave out to all the country. "Ridiculous" is his word.

The Treasury is a great and powerful arm of the Government. Its head is one of the most important officials of this Nation of more than 130,000,000 souls. The newspapers and press associations rightly assign able reporters to cover what is done and said at the Treasury. When the Secretary speaks to his assembled press conference he is at great advantage, since the entire country is eagerly listening to catch his every word. He is a most influential man. He should, therefore, be careful of what he says. The country assumes that he is.

I was not present at the Secretary's press conference. I did not personally hear his remarks. But I have sufficient confidence in the newspaper reporters who cover the Treasury to believe that they accurately conveyed to their readers the impression which the head of the Treasury wished conveyed concerning my speech on this country's present gold and silver policies.

Moreover, Mr. President, I should like to call attention to the fact that on January 31 the newspapers again quoted Secretary Morgenthau in a new statement in which he again ridiculed my gold-and-silver speech of January 27.

Not content with his quoted remarks of January 29, he "supplemented his criticism," to adopt the expression which was used by the New York Times in reporting the event.

The Secretary does honor indeed when he devotes so much attention to what he has described as a "ridiculous" statement.

Mr. President, exactly what was it that I said which brought forth such an irritated epithet as "ridiculous" from the eminent Secretary? And just what does the Secretary say are the facts of the matter?

First, my statement—what I said was this:

All of us here know that this country during recent years has received vast amounts of foreign bullion, for which foreigners have received billions of dollars in exchange. This situation, without question, has constituted a tremendous boon to the outside world. * * *

Certainly there is a queer inconsistency between our ardent desire to give embattled Finland every possible assistance and our continuous purchase of any or all gold mined in Russia, which is now the world's second largest gold-producing country. Since Russia mines about $175,000,000 of gold a year, our policy helps Russia many times as much as we have been able to help Finland. Surely our purchasing of gold and silver from Japan is not harmonious with our $25,000,000 loan to China or with our Japanese policy. Something is definitely screwy about such careless philanthropy.

This is only a quotation. My full speech will be found in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 387 to 389.

What does the Secretary say? Let me read from the Associated Press account, as given in the Evening Star of this city:

Replying to a criticism by Senator TOWNSEND, Republican, of Delaware, against Treasury purchases of Russian gold, Secretary Morgenthau said yesterday the Treasury's policy was to buy whatever gold was offered at the fixed price of $35 per ounce, regardless of source.

The Washington Times-Herald of January 30 reported:

There is not likely to be any discrimination against purchases of gold from Russia and Japan, Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau indicated yesterday.

He said that there has been no discrimination in the past in the administration's gold-purchase program and doubted whether there would be in the future.

Criticism has mounted in Congress against the administration's purchase of Russian gold while at the same time pretending to be aiding Finland. Also, Morgenthau had hinted last July that the administration could take retaliatory action against Japan by refusing to buy Japanese gold and silver.

Mr. President, unless I am quite unfamiliar with the English language, what the Secretary says about our willingness to buy foreign gold regardless of origin, and what I said in my speech, are identical.

In my speech I did not say that the benefits which Russia, as one of the outstanding world gold-producing countries, receives as a result of our policy of buying all the world's gold at $35 an ounce comes from the delivery of the Russian gold in the form of Russian bars to our Treasury. I cited the undeniable fact that we cannot buy up two or three times the world's gold and silver production, as we have been doing, without benefiting all foreign producers and all foreign sellers.

Imagine the situation in Washington if the Government should go out and lease 95 percent of all the apartment houses here. Can anyone be expected to believe that such a situation would not confer great benefit and advantage on the owners of the remaining 5 percent of apartment houses?

Let me quote, Mr. President, from the Secretary's second broadside at my speech, the one carried in the press of January 31. I shall quote from the report carried in the New York Times of January 31. It reads in part:

WASHINGTON, January 30.—The United States Treasury bought no gold from Russia in 1939, Secretary Morgenthau said today.

Supplementing his criticism of Senator TOWNSEND's intimation that the Treasury might have bought the entire Russian gold output, which he estimated at $176,000,000 since passage of the Gold Reserve Act, the Secretary answered inquiries today with details of recent imports of gold from Russia.

Although there were no imports of gold from Russia last year, the Secretary said that in the last 6 months of 1939 the assay office in New York received two deposits of gold bars worth $10,500,000 bearing a Russian stamp, but which were shipped from countries other than Russia. He said no Russian bars had been bought by the Treasury so far this year.

Note, incidentally, that I have been misquoted in the statement from which I have just read. That statement attributes to me the estimate of Russia's gold production as "$176,000,000 since passage of the Gold Reserve Act." This is a great understatement of what I said in my January 27 speech. What I then said was that Russia produces "about $175,000,000 of gold a year"—that is, in 1 year. If we took the entire 6 years since passage of the Gold Reserve Act, the estimate would have to be several times as large.

I am very much afraid the able Secretary of the Treasury is trying to take our eye off the ball when he tells us that in 1939 the assay office received only two deposits of gold bars bearing a Russian stamp. Were such a statement given out by anyone other than the respected Secretary of the Treasury I should suspect that he was trying to quibble or joke.

Since the assay office sees so little Russian gold "bearing a Russian stamp," let me read at this point a brief and very informative United Press dispatch which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of October 24, 1939, under the heading "Huge Buying by Soviet Seen":

LONDON, October 24 (Tuesday).—Informed quarters said today that 17½ tons of Soviet gold to be used for the purchase of goods in the United States had been shipped across Germany and is now on deposit in Netherlands banks. The outbreak of the war made it difficult for British firms to fill previously placed large orders from Russia for machinery, tools, and other manufactured products. It was believed that the Russians were seeking to make such purchases in the United States.

The United Press, which sent this dispatch, is not a branch of the Government. It is not official. It is not infallible. Perhaps it was misled in some respect in sending such a story to this country. I am not vouching for the facts in the United Press dispatch. For all I know, someone may call it ridiculous; but, as for me, I have sufficient sense to know that Russian gold can be melted in any of a dozen countries and sent here for sale, and there will be no Russian stamp on the bars.

So let us take some official figures. From page 253 of the December 1938 issue of the British Government's official Accounts Relating to Trade and Navigation of the United Kingdom, which country in 1939 supplied about two-thirds of our gold imports, I learn that the United Kingdom received from Russia gold valued at £40,367,787 sterling in 1937 and £23,326,365 sterling in 1938. Since the United Kingdom in turn sent to us very much more gold than it imported from the U. S. S. R., does it take the Secret Service to discover what became of the Russian gold?

If the Treasury's Secret Service wants any further information on this matter, I can tell them—confidentially, of course—that it is published each month in the Federal Reserve Bulletin.

I am only a small country banker, Mr. President, but I hope I am smart enough to know that when the entire outside world produces in 1 year gold which it sells for about $1,000,000,000, and when in that same year our gold policy forces us to absorb from abroad more than $3,000,000,000 of the metal, then every producing country is helped, aided, and subsidized by our policy.

Perhaps that will be described as ridiculous.

There is another point wherein the newspaper reporters who cover the Treasury Department seem to have obtained the impression that the Secretary of the Treasury was casting aspersions on my speech. The desired effect of these numerous stories broadcast to the press of the land seems to be to make it look as though I do not know what I am talking about.

Let me quote once again from the same newspapers. Said the Associated Press in its January 30 dispatch:

He—

The Secretary of the Treasury—

added he had never been able to get accurate figures of Russian gold production.

Hundreds of newspapers must have received that sad news.

And in New York the 532,058 readers of the New York Times, to name merely one lone newspaper, on January 31 were enabled to read the following in the dispatch which their correspondent at the Treasury sent them:

The Secretary declared yesterday that he had tried unsuccessfully ever since he had been in office to obtain accurate figures on Soviet production of gold. Even the Bank for International Settlements, it was recalled, could obtain nothing but rough approximations from Russia to include in its annual report of world production of gold.

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury on December 13, 1939, reported to the House Appropriations Committee—hearings, page 10—that he has a research staff of 66 persons, which he has built up during the past few years. And he has 64 other assistants assigned to the Secretary's office. Congress has liberally provided him with able and expensive helpers and researchers. Yet the Secretary of the Treasury "ever since he has been in office" does not know where to look for information on Russia's gold production. And, I presume, his research staff is equally helpless in the matter, since he does not have the information.

Well, Mr. President, since I have no expensive research staff, being only a country banker, I do not go to the Bank for International Settlements hunting for information. I admit I may be old-fashioned, but I am willing to use as my source an annual publication which has for years enjoyed the respect of researchers.

I have here a copy of a little black book [exhibiting] which comes out of the Government Printing Office, and which, let it be noted, is published in the Treasury itself.

I refer to the annual report of the Director of the Mint, the issue of 1939. It is called Treasury Department Document No. 3103, and on page 14 carries the printed signature of Hon. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury.

It must be that he has never seen it. So I wish to call the Secretary's attention to page 103 of that well-known report, giving statistics on Russia's gold production in the calendar year 1938, ridiculous as it may appear.

In my speech which the Secretary criticizes I stated Russia's gold production to be $175,000,000. Being only a country banker, I was perhaps too inexact in my remarks of January 27.

What does the mint report say about Russia's gold production? It makes no reference to the Bank for International Settlements. It says nothing about the difficulties which have confronted the Secretary of the Treasury in finding information since he assumed his present office some years ago. It simply gives the figures.

In 1938, says our Mint Bureau, Russia produced 5,235,909 ounces of gold, and at our price of $35 an ounce the mint calculates its value at $183,256,815—not $175,000,000; not $183,000,000 but $183,256,815.

Russia benefits much more from our gold policy than my January 27 speech indicated. I greatly understated the case.

Mr. President, am I not ridiculous?

Or is it the mint which is ridiculous? Is it perhaps the Bureau of the Mint which erred in reporting Russia's gold production, when the able Director of the Mint, Mrs. Nellie Tayloe Ross, had only to walk down the hall to learn from the Secretary of the Treasury himself that "there ain't no such animal"?

Mr. President, I am really glad that the Secretary of the Treasury has had his attention called to the gold and silver problem of this country by the reporters who cover the Treasury. For I say to him and to you, when the United States holds the largest stocks of gold and silver ever accumulated by any government in the history of mankind and keeps on buying them at high and artificial prices, then that is ridiculous.

When we have a law requiring the purchase of foreign silver with absolutely no determinable end to the purchases, when 40 percent of the huge New Deal silver purchases is at present held idle in the Treasury because there is absolutely no need for it, then that is ridiculous.

When the price of silver is dropping and no one wants the metal and our Treasury steps in and pegs the market, as it did last summer and on numerous other occasions, thereby forcing itself to pay more for foreign silver than the metal can be had for, then that is ridiculous.

When no other country will buy the flood of gold and silver, and we alone stand dumbly in the breach and pay good American dollars for it all, then that is ridiculous.

When the Secretary of the Treasury, as manager of the stabilization fund, sells silver to himself as manager of the general fund, marks up the price in the process, and then announces that the stabilization fund has made a profit, that is ridiculous.

When we have more than $5,500,000,000 of excess reserves and the Federal Reserve System is powerless, as it tells us, to prevent a wild inflation, and yet we keep on adding to those excess reserves by purchasing unwanted foreign gold and silver at fancy prices, then that is ridiculous.

When, according to Treasury statistics, more than 32,000 ocean vessels and more than 1,600,000 freight cars cannot carry away enough real American wealth to pay for a single year's purchases of unneeded and unresalable foreign gold and silver, then that is ridiculous.

Mr. President, I could go on almost indefinitely citing the ridiculous features of our present gold and silver policies. Senators who are interested in more of these facts may find them in my speech printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, 1940, on pages 1191 to 1193, and in the Banking and Currency Committee's hearings last year on my bill, S. 785, to repeal the Silver Purchase Act of 1934.

I assure the Senate that the present gold and silver policies cannot endure, and the sooner we face the problem, the less will be the ultimate cost of repairing the damage and loss those policies have already occasioned.

I ask consent, Mr. President, that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point a table prepared for me by the Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, from official customs figures, showing how this country week after week has been buying gold and silver it has utterly no need for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Also I ask to have printed in the Record a table, Selected Gold Production Costs, which I have prepared, showing the low cost of gold production abroad compared with the high price we are paying for the metal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to comment very briefly upon the address made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] in the Senate today and also the speech he delivered a few days ago before the Del-Mar-Va Press Association.

Mr. President, I realize the interest the Senator from Delaware and all other Senators and, indeed, all other people possessing any information on the subject have in the question of the purchase of gold on the part of the United States and likewise the purchase of silver, which is a subject in which the Senator from Delaware is equally interested.

I got the impression from the news reports of the Senator's speech that he was criticizing this country for buying gold produced in Russia, because it was an aid to Russia, and anything that we might do that aided Russia was automatically an injury to Finland. I appreciate the Senator's interest in Finland and his desire to aid Finland in some way, even if it be only by withdrawing any possible or theoretical aid to Russia growing out of the purchase of gold. The Senate will have an opportunity at an early date, I hope, to pass on the question of whatever aid we can render to Finland, and I am sure the Senator from Delaware will continue to manifest his great interest in Finland when that proposed legislation reaches the floor of the Senate.

The impression might have been created that we are merely going out deliberately and buying gold from Russia and that we are engaged in a sort of indiscriminate philanthropy because of that. I am not going into the discussion of the wisdom of any further accumulation of gold on the part of the United States, but we do know that gold arrives here largely because of international trade. It comes here in payment for goods and services rendered by the people of the United States to the country which sends it here or the country which produces it, which may not always be the country which exports it into the United States.

Inasmuch as our imports are restricted, and there is a disposition in some quarters to restrict our imports still further, if we are to sell our own surpluses in the markets of the world the only way in which they can be paid for is either in money or in services of some sort. Inasmuch as we have a favorable balance of trade—by which I mean, of course, that we sell to the world more than we buy—insofar as we restrict their ability to pay for those goods by the importation of goods, and insofar as they are unable to pay for them by any services which they render, we are bound either to take payment in gold or to cease the sale of our surplus commodities to the nations of the world.

It would be of no particular damage to Russia, and no conceivable benefit to Finland, if we should cease altogether to receive gold produced in Russia, because the price which we are paying for gold is approximately the price that is being paid in many other parts of the world; and Russia could sell her gold to these other nations. It would lose its identity in transformation and in the exchange of commodities, so that we would not always know whether we were receiving, even from other countries, gold produced in Russia or Japan, inasmuch as the Senator referred to our purchase of gold and silver from Japan with the same implication—that we were thereby, if not intentionally at least in effect, aiding Russia and Japan to the injury of Finland and China. So it would not benefit either China or Finland for us to cease buying either gold or silver in exchange for our commodities, or for services that we render in the ordinary transactions of international trade and commerce.

Of course, we all know that we have accumulated in this country a very large supply of gold—more, I suppose, than any nation in history ever owned at any one time—not all of it the property of the Government, by the way. What is ultimately to become of that gold, and what use may be made of it, are matters which are open to discussion. There are numerous theories on the subject, and I am not going into any of them at this time; but I do wish to say that insofar as the direct or indirect receipt of gold by the United States from Russia or Japan or any other country is a distinct injury to the democracies—that was the theory I got in reading the newspaper reports of the Senator's speech, that it was a criticism of our policy because it was a distinct injury to China, which is battling for her life, and Finland, which is battling for her life, and a distinct benefit to Russia and Japan because of that fact—the very same gold that comes directly from Russia or Japan, the very same silver that reaches our ports or our vaults, might reach them in any other way by a more indirect route, but they would reach us just the same, because they come in as a part of the international set-up around commerce, trade, and services and all the things that go to make international balances.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the Senator is correct; we cannot distinguish where the gold or the silver come from. I agree with him fully as to that; but if he will read my speech, he will see that I used Russia and Japan as illustrations. I was referring to the policy of our country in continuing to buy gold and silver at present artificially high prices from all governments everywhere. That was my theory.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator knows that the Government of the United States is not buying as a government from other governments as governments all the gold which they produce. Gold arrives here in payment for things which other countries obtain from us, and it is purchased by the Government of the United States under the Gold Reserve Act, which was passed in 1933, I believe. While the wisdom of that policy is a matter about which men will debate, and the final use to which that gold will be put is a matter about which men will differ, it is my settled opinion now that if we were suddenly to cease the purchase of gold by the Treasury of the United States under the policy now in vogue it would so upset the entire international trade situation as to bring possible disaster not only upon other countries but upon ourselves and our own economy as well. That, however, is a subject which lends itself to controversy and long debate, and I do not now desire to indulge in any long discussion of the matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I agree with the Senator in many of his arguments; but this country now has 64 percent of all the gold in the world, and it is coming in at a rapid rate, and soon we shall have all the gold in the world if we continue to pay this extravagant price. I am not advocating the entire discontinuance of the purchase of gold, but I am advocating that the Congress study the problem and find the solution which will help this country most.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, I am sympathetic with the suggestion that Congress study the problem, and I think we are studying it. We are studying it individually, and the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the Senator from Delaware is a member, has been authorized by the Senate to make a special study of all our monetary problems and is setting about to lay the foundation to make such a study. What that study will result in I am not at this time enough of a prophet to foresee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wonder if the Senator can tell us what the state of that committee is today. Is there anything more than a chairman of it?

Mr. BARKLEY. Why, yes. The whole committee is occupying a very live and active status. I will say to the Senator that in the committee only a week or so ago the matter came up, and it has come up on almost every occasion when the committee has been in session. The question arose as to whether the committee should immediately begin to hold hearings by promiscuously inviting men who have any views on the monetary question—and the Senator knows how numerous are the views held by numerous persons in this country—to come to the Capital and give their views to the committee; or whether the committee should first lay the foundation for its investigation by calling upon the departments of the Government which deal with the question, including the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve bank authorities, the Federal Reserve Board, the Treasury, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and all other agencies which may deal with the question of our monetary policy, to submit to the committee facts with reference to it in order that the committee might first study those facts and, based upon those facts, decide to what extent it would have public hearings on the subject of our monetary policy.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am seeking information, because not more than 2 weeks ago my office made inquiries about the special committee, and was informed that there was not any such thing excepting a chairman. I should like to ask the Senator when the committee was made up; when its membership was filled.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator will recall that the resolution authorizing the investigation authorized the entire Banking and Currency Committee to make the investigation. No subcommittee was appointed to go into the matter, and I do not think a subcommittee has as yet been appointed to make the specific study; but by a very large majority of votes in the committee a week or 10 days ago it was decided to call upon these agencies first for information that might be studied, and then further action would be taken toward any hearings that might be thought wise as a result of the information gathered.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does the Senator believe that the standing committee will continue to act, or does he believe that there will be a special committee?

Mr. BARKLEY. When the information and reports come in, if the circumstances seem to justify it, I am sure the committee will decide to select a smaller subcommittee to go into the facts and to hold the hearings; but I cannot prophesy about the matter until that time arrives.

Mr. President, I wish to have inserted in the RECORD at this point certain excerpts from a lengthy letter of the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], dated March 22, 1939, in reply to a letter written to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] on March 14, 1939, in which the Senator asks certain specific questions with reference to our gold purchases and our gold supply. I also ask—I have them marked here, and will indicate them to the reporter—that certain excerpts from a letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] on October 24, 1939, be printed in the RECORD. The Secretary of the Treasury replied to a letter written to him by the Senator from Michigan on October 17 of the same year.

I ask unanimous consent that in connection with my remarks I may include in the RECORD certain excerpts which I have indicated from these letters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MARCH 22, 1939.

MY DEAR SENATOR:

3. Why has so much gold come to the United States in the past 5 years?

Gold comes into the United States in settlement of the balance of international payments arising out of all transactions between the United States and all foreign countries. These international transactions include exports, imports, shipping services, tourists' expenditures, capital movements, interest payments, etc. When the demand for dollar exchange increases more rapidly than the supply of dollar exchange resulting from these transactions, the price of dollar exchange on the foreign exchange market rises. It may rise to a rate at which it becomes profitable for bankers and dealers, foreign and American, to ship gold to the United States, sell the gold to the Treasury for dollars, and then sell these dollars on the foreign exchange market.

Therefore, to answer the question why large amounts of gold flow to the United States it is necessary only to explain why United States dollar exchange is so much in demand.

A survey of our balance of payments for the last few years reveals at once that the greatly increased demand for dollar exchange which has taken place during the past 5 years is largely a consequence of the huge flow of capital to the United States and, more recently, of the large favorable trade balance. None of the other categories of items in our international transactions can be held responsible for the substantial net increase in the demand for dollar exchange during this period. In fact, for several important categories the net demand for dollar exchange decreased. It is the flow of capital to this country, particularly before 1938, upon which our attention must be focused if we are to understand the chief reason for the large gold inflow.

The following figures show the contrast between the large recorded inflow of capital in the past 5 years and persistent and large outflow of capital in the years preceding:

Outflow
1928-----	$850,000,000
1929-----	217,000,000
1930-----	752,000,000
1931-----	490,000,000
1932-----	192,000,000
1933-----	336,000,000
Inflow
1934-----	$386,000,000
1935-----	1,537,000,000
1936-----	1,141,000,000
1937-----	800,000,000
1938-----	369,000,000

The capital inflow in the years from 1935 through 1937 was the major factor responsible for the inflow of gold, for it amounted in total to $3,500,000,000, or 86 percent of the value of gold imported during that period.

The trade item did not become important from the point of view of gold inflows until the last quarter of 1937. From 1934 to 1937 the excess of our exports over imports averaged only $250,000,000 a year. (Incidentally, if silver imports were included in our merchandise imports, which is the procedure followed by many countries in the world, our excess of exports over imports would have amounted to only $80,000,000 a year in this period.) In 1938, however, the favorable trade balance greatly increased and was the dominant factor inducing the large flow of gold into the United States. The excess of exports over imports totaled $1,134,000,000—the largest we have had in 17 years. This increased "favorable" balance of trade, together with other items, was responsible for the net inflow in that year of $1,600,000,000 of gold.

Thus it is evident that because there was a large inflow of capital in recent years and in 1938 a large excess of exports over imports there was a great increase in the net demand for dollar exchange; and because of this large increase in the net demand for dollars there was a large inflow of gold. Therefore, in the final analysis, your question, "Why has so much gold come into the United States?" reduces itself to the questions, "Why did so much capital come to this country during the past 5 years?" and "Why did we have so large a 'favorable' trade balance in 1938?"

The answer to the first of these two questions, together with a description of the kinds of capital coming here, was given in some detail in my letter to Senator VANDENBERG of September 22, 1936, a copy of which is enclosed for your convenience.

In section 3 of that letter the causes of capital imports into the United States are set forth as follows:

"(a) Capital withdrawn from abroad by American owners because of the greater security or the more attractive field for investment offered the capital at home. The return of these funds to the United States—much of which left the country in 1930, 1931, and 1932—is, of course, an indication of the relative strength of our recovery and of the prevailing confidence in the future of American industry and American financial institutions.

"(b) Funds sent to this country by foreigners who likewise felt that American securities offered a more attractive or more secure investment opportunity than did investments available to them elsewhere.

"(c) Repurchase by foreigners of some of the foreign securities which Americans had purchased during the post-war decade and were now glad to get rid of even at low prices. This was particularly true of the securities of certain countries where nominal high exchange rates were coupled with devices whereby the nationals of these countries were encouraged to repatriate these securities at an exchange profit to themselves, or where maintenance of debt service was provided for only internally but not for foreign holders.

"(d) Need created by increasing foreign trade for larger working dollar balances to be kept in American banks by foreign banks and traders. Our international trade during 1934 and 1935 increased by one-third over the 2 years previous. It is to be expected that this greater volume of foreign trade transactions would call for larger working dollar balances.

"(e) Fear prevailing in some countries abroad of confiscation of property or of loss through inflation of their local currencies led during this period to a flight of capital from some of the countries whose economic and political situations have been threatened by disturbances with which you are doubtless familiar.

"(f) Lastly, funds sent to this country by speculators in the hope or expectation that an exchange profit will be possible if and when the currencies of their countries become depreciated in terms of the dollar.

"These are the causes which account for most of the capital inflows. Yet these capital inflows would not have resulted in such large sums being due to the United States were it not for the virtual cessation of foreign investments by Americans. Whereas in the years prior to the depression, annual foreign investments by Americans of more than a billion dollars were common, since 1931 the annual sums invested abroad have been negligible; nor does it appear that the United States will approach in the near future the predepression volume of foreign investment."

Since the above was written (September 1936), nothing has occurred to alter substantially the trend of capital movements or the reasons for them. With the exception of one 9-month period, capital has continued to flow to the United States in large volume. During that 9-month period, October 1937 to June 1938, there was a net outflow of short-term capital of over $1,000,000,000, but the flow was reversed during the fall of 1938, and more than a billion of short-term capital has since come to the United States.

Capital will continue to flow into the United States in large amounts so long as—

(a) the opportunities for secure and profitable investment in foreign countries are not great enough to attract American capital abroad;

(b) the prospects of continued recovery here appear satisfactory to foreigners;

(c) the political situation abroad remains disturbed; and

(d) there is possibility of further depreciation of some foreign currencies.

Whether the flow of capital into the United States will continue to take the form of gold or whether it will gradually assume the form of goods and services rather than gold depends upon the rapidity with which the mechanism of adjustments of international accounts operates. In earlier decades this adjustment process operated tolerably well and with fair speed to transform international movements of net balances into movements of goods and services. This adjustment process served to keep gold movements between countries relatively small in volume. In recent years, however, this mechanism has operated badly and haltingly. Moreover, it has had to operate under sudden and large capital and trade shifts which differed from those of earlier decades not only in magnitude but in character. To put it graphically, the mechanism of adjustment has had a heavier load to carry, the road has been uphill, and the incline has grown steeper.

The reasons and nature of this change taking place in the effectiveness of the so-called adjustment process of international accounts are matters too technical to warrant discussing in this letter. Suffice to say that because the numerous obstacles to rapid adjustment still prevail in virtually all countries with free exchanges any large movement of capital to the United States in the near future will doubtless take the form largely of an inflow of gold.

The significance of this fact as an explanation of the continuing flow of gold to the United States cannot be emphasized too strongly. As compared with the decades prior to 1930, there are now different relationships between international movements of capital and of gold, changes in domestic price levels, trade changes, contraction and expansion of credit, and changes in the volume of business activity. Realization of this basic economic change is necessary to appreciate the need for treating present-day problems of gold and capital flows quite differently than was appropriate prior to 1929. Monetary experience of those years, particularly in its international aspects, does not suffice for safe guidance for present-day policy.

4. Is it true that gold comes here in large amounts because the Treasury is paying a higher price than other countries for gold, and because it buys gold at a fixed price?

This is a question we frequently hear. Unfortunately it is not wholly clear just what is meant since the phrase a "higher price for gold" may be interpreted in two quite different ways, and the answer to each of the two interpretations would be arrived at through quite different lines of reasoning.

If the question be interpreted to mean that gold comes to the United States in large amounts because we pay a higher price than other countries do in terms of a money price (i. e., in terms of dollars), then the answer is definitely "No." The United States pays the same price for gold, allowing for arbitrage and transportation costs, that any other country does—no more and no less. We do not pay any higher prices for gold than does England or France or Belgium or India.

The price of gold that is permitted to move freely in international channels of trade is, and must be, virtually the same the world over. An Englishman who sells gold in London gets the same return in pounds and shillings for it—with small variations to be explained in a moment—as he would get were he to send the same gold to New York or to Amsterdam, or to Paris or to Bombay, to be sold. Right now, for example, he would get about 148 shillings for an ounce of gold in the London gold market. If he ships that gold and sells it to the United States, he gets $35 an ounce, less one-fourth of 1 percent. When he converts the dollar proceeds of the sale of that ounce of gold back into sterling and deducts the expenses of shipping, he gets approximately the same amount of sterling as he would have obtained had he sold the gold at home, namely, about 148 shillings. In other words, when a foreigner translates the dollars he gets from the sale of his gold back to his own currency, he finds that the price of gold is almost the same in London, Paris, Amsterdam, or Johannesburg. We pay dollars for gold, England pays sterling, Holland pays guilders, etc., but when conversion from one currency into another is made at the prevailing exchange rates, we find that an ounce of gold brings approximately the same price in one country as in another.

I say approximately the same price. There are slight relative variations in the price as between different countries, variations which inevitably result from changes in the supply of and demand for foreign exchange. Any change, no matter how slight, in the relationship of the supply of foreign exchange to the demand will bring about a change in the price for foreign exchange. The fluctuations of exchange rates, together with the fluctuations in the price of gold in terms of foreign currencies, result in the occurrence of relative differences in the price of gold in different national money markets when computed in terms of a single currency, but these relative variations can occur only within narrow limits.

These slight relative variations in the price of gold as among various markets which make possible a profit in shipping gold from one country to another would continue whether we paid $10 an ounce for gold, or $50, or $60. Slight variations in the dollar-sterling, dollar-franc, dollar-guilder rates, etc., do give dealers small profits when selling gold in one market rather than another, but those variations operate as among all countries and at all levels of prices for gold; they are not peculiar to the United States alone, nor to the $35 price for gold. Exactly the same condition prevailed when the price of gold was $20.67 an ounce and when other countries had a fixed price of gold. It is the normal mechanism which has always prevailed, and must inevitably prevail, so long as gold is the international medium of exchange.

To dispose briefly of another common misconception, it has been sometimes claimed that gold comes here because the United States pays a fixed price for gold, whereas other countries buy gold at varying prices. The mere fact of fixity of the price of gold in terms of any given currency has little to do with the movement of gold. For example, England does not have a fixed price for gold, and yet her net imports of gold in some of the past few years were greater than ours. Belgium has had a fixed price for gold for 2 years, yet her reported gold holdings are no higher now than they were 3 years ago. Moreover, our gold price, although fixed in terms of dollars, is not fixed in terms of other currencies. When, for example, an Englishman sells gold to the United States, the number of dollars he gets may be fixed, but the amount of sterling he gets, if he converts the dollars into sterling, is not fixed; it fluctuates with every change in the sterling-dollar exchange rate. The amount in his own currency which an Englishman or a Frenchman receives when he sells gold is not fixed, whether he sells his gold in New York, London, or Paris.

So far, in answer to this question, the discussion has been based on the interpretation of the phrase "higher price" as meaning a higher monetary price. If, however, the phrase is to be understood to mean—as is doubtless intended by many who put the question—a "higher price" in terms of money but of goods and services, then the question becomes a quite different one. It should then be phrased as follows: "Is it not true that gold comes to the United States in large amounts because we give more goods and services for a dollar (or its monetary equivalent in foreign currencies) than does any other country?"

The answer to this question is likewise "no," though less unqualifiedly so because adequate statistical data for a categorical answer are not available.

The purchasing power of the dollar in the United States in terms of goods can be compared with its purchasing power in other countries only very roughly and only with respect to those goods which do (or easily might) move from country to country. With respect to services comparison of the purchasing power of the dollar in the United States and elsewhere relates chiefly to shipping services and the expenditures by tourists.

Now it is extremely difficult to measure the differences in purchasing power of gold or currency as between different countries even with respect to such goods and services. Fortunately, for the purposes of the question we are examining, no such measurement is necessary. Were it true that an ounce of gold had a significantly higher purchasing power over American internationally traded goods than over foreign goods, indirect but definite evidence would be revealed in our trade figures. Our export excess would have so increased since 1933 that either we would have drained the outside world of all its monetary gold or we would have forced other countries to adopt strict exchange or import controls or much higher tariff schedules. No such developments have occurred. Foreign countries still have large gold holdings, many of them have not significantly heightened their barriers against imports of the world.

Convincing evidence that we do not pay a higher price for gold than do other countries in terms of goods and services is contained in the record of our balance of international payments on current account. For the years 1934 to 1937, inclusive, the balance of payments with respect to the pertinent commodity and service items was in the aggregate unfavorable by $1,200,000,000, as far as the records show. Unfortunately, however, our international accounts, though more complete and reliable than those of other countries, are still subject to a substantial margin of error. In each year there has been a substantial residual item (i. e., unaccounted for) which during the 4 years in question totaled approximately one and one-half billion dollars due the United States. Some portion of this favorable balance must be allocated to trade and services—how much it is impossible to know. But even if we allocated the whole residual item to commodity and service items—which would be an extravagant allowance—there would result only a small balance due the United States for those items during the 4 years in question—$400,000,000 for the 4-year period.

This constitutes too small a sum relative to the magnitudes involved in our balance of payments to justify the claim that an ounce of gold can buy more here than elsewhere.

There is little basis, therefore, for the contention that an ounce of gold could in general buy more goods and services in the United States than elsewhere from the year 1934 to 1937, inclusive. Or, to put it in simpler and more accurate terms, the United States did not achieve any special competitive advantage in international markets as a consequence of its external monetary policy. The change in the gold value of the dollar in 1933 merely helped the United States to regain its earlier position. In 1933 the trade situation appeared to change. We did experience a sharp increase in our trade balance. Exports, as pointed out earlier, exceeded imports in 1933 by some $800,000,000 more than in 1937. But most of this increase cannot be attributed to any changed relationship of the dollar to other currencies because the exports excess arose from a sharp decrease in imports, and not from an increase in exports. The recession in the United States, more marked and earlier than in other countries, caused a temporary decrease in our purchases from abroad greater than the simultaneous decrease in our exports. This gap may be expected to narrow as recovery proceeds.

The only sense in which it might be said that we give more for gold than other countries is that in addition to $35 an ounce we also give peace, security, prospects of higher returns on investment, and better speculative opportunities, with the result that foreign capital funds flow here in the shape of gold. It is these values that constitute the chief factor conducive to a flow of gold to the United States.

6. Why doesn't the Treasury stop buying gold?

A simple way of stopping gold from coming into the United States would be for the Treasury to announce to the world that we will not buy any more gold for the time being. But such a step, taken unilaterally, would have disastrous effects on our economy. It would disrupt the foreign exchanges and gold-bullion markets and would very soon cause such drastic disturbances in international trade, and even in the domestic sphere, as seriously to impede the recovery of business.

Present relationships among the various leading currencies would be upset. The dollar probably would appreciate immediately in terms of other leading currencies. At present, when the demand for dollar exchange increases, foreigners need only obtain gold (either at home or on the London market), ship it here and obtain dollars in exchange. Thus an increased demand for dollar exchange relative to the supply is met. If, however, this means of securing dollar exchange were removed, dollars would rise in value indefinitely in terms of other currencies. While it is impossible to know in advance what rates of exchange would finally emerge, we can be certain of at least one thing—that no country would benefit from the ensuing international monetary disruption.

Were the United States, moreover, to declare a complete embargo on gold imports, it might deal a serious blow to the value of gold as a monetary medium. (Such action coming at a period when there was discussion of the possibility of world overabundance of gold might have repercussions which would disturb the public's confidence in the value of gold.) The leading gold-producing areas would be hard hit and some might even be involved in a major economic crisis.

A closely related question that has frequently been asked is: Should not the price of gold be reduced? Is not $35 an ounce too high a price for gold? Possibly the simplest way to answer this question is to examine the consequences that would ensue from an increase in the gold content of the dollar (or, to phrase it another way, from a decrease in the monetary value of gold).

A reduction by Congress in the monetary value of gold would probably not be as calamitous as a complete embargo. It would limit the extent of possible depreciation of gold (or appreciation of the dollar in terms of foreign currencies) and the psychological disturbance caused by the change would not be as potent, yet it would have disadvantages serious enough to render resort to any such action most unwise. If the reduction made in the price of gold were small, our trade and service balance would not be much affected over the next year or so, nor would the inflow of capital cease. Once the drop in the price of gold was regarded by the rest of the world as definitive, the subsequent effect on capital imports would be virtually nil. Our securities would continue to be bought for the same reasons that they are bought now and dollar balances on foreign account would also continue to increase for the same reasons that they are increasing now.

But were a small decline in the price of gold to be regarded by numerous domestic and foreign investors and exchange speculators as being but the first of a series of drops, the result might well be to attract more, not less, funds to the United States and to intensify the inflow of gold—the very thing it is designed to check. Speculators would rush to buy dollars and hold them here in anticipation of the next appreciation. Thus the effect on capital movements, both long-term and short-term, might more than offset the effect on trade and service items; instead of getting less gold we would find ourselves getting more.

On the other hand, were the monetary value of gold to be cut with one stroke substantially, and definitely—say, for example, to $25 an ounce—the effect would be quite different from that described above. Such a step might reduce the volume of gold imports and perhaps give rise to an outflow of large dimensions; but the economic effects on our economy of the change in the foreign exchange value of the dollar would be little short of disastrous. The 40-percent increase in the price of American currencies to foreigners would constitute a severe handicap upon our exports. Our exports play a role in the level of business activity much in excess of the magnitudes involved and so great an appreciation of our currency in terms of other currencies would be bound to curtail our exports seriously. In the past 6 months the dollar has appreciated in terms of other leading currencies by some 5 percent and price movements in the various countries have not been such as to offset this competitive disadvantage to us. The appreciation of the dollar has not been due to a change in the dollar price for gold but rather to a depreciation of foreign currencies in terms of gold. You will note that our exports during January 1939 were more than 40 percent less than they were in January 1938. Although it is too soon to evaluate the full significance of the decline, it is not unreasonable to assume that the less favorable position of the dollar in terms of other currency—that is, higher prices of foreign currencies in terms of gold—contributed to the drop in exports.

Our imports, on the other hand, would, in the event of a reduction in the price of gold to $25 an ounce, be 30 percent cheaper. Our domestic producers would then be exposed to greatly sharpened competition in the American market from foreign producers both because the prices in dollars of imports would be less and also because the numerous ad valorem duties would constitute smaller protection.

Foreigners would have a greater advantage in this market, but, unfortunately, even this would be of dubious value to them. The ability of Americans to buy goods, whether imports or domestic goods, depends chiefly upon the state of business activity here. It is chiefly for that reason that our imports during the recession of 1938 dropped to almost one-half and that our imports began to increase in the fall of 1938. Thus, though the sharp appreciation of the dollar would make foreign goods cheaper in this country, our imports might actually be less than during the previous period, and instead of benefiting the rest of the world we would be hurting world business as well as our own.

Judging from past experience, we could not expect the prices of domestic commodities and services to move either at home or abroad with sufficient rapidity to adjust quickly and fully to any substantial alteration in exchange rates. For many months, perhaps for years, the economic position of large groups of American producers, including farmers, would be worsened and there would be widespread unemployment. The combined effect on our domestic economy of a sharp drop in exports and of increasing competition in the domestic market would be keenly felt. Domestic prices would begin to fall. Many corporations would suffer loss of business and profits. In times such as the present these short-run effects—and by "short run" we mean from a few months to several years—are of paramount importance. To brush aside, as some are prone to do, these short-run effects on the ground that in the long run appropriate adjustments will take place is to ignore the unstable world in which we live and the real problems which confront us from day to day.

Moreover, were we to reduce the price of gold and were it to result in an outflow of gold, there is no reason to believe that the countries who most need gold would get it. On the contrary, were gold to leave the United States it would probably find a resting place in the very countries whose currencies would for the moment appear most secure. Certainly no gold would flow to Latin American countries in any substantial amount, nor would the Far East or the Balkans obtain more gold. The loss of gold by the United States would not correct the serious maldistribution. It would rather operate only to take away some from the United States which has too much and to add it to the holdings of other countries which likewise have too much.

Thus we are confronted with the fact that though we should like to receive less gold and even to get rid of substantial amounts of the gold we already have, there is, under the existing circumstances, no acceptable alternative to the policy we have been pursuing. In the case of all the proposals we have examined, the remedy has always been worse than the disease. The best way to reduce our gold inflow on commodity and service account is for us to have full recovery so that our imports will rise more rapidly than our exports.

7. Of what use to us is this large stock of gold? Is there any likelihood that we will get so much of the world's gold that we will get stuck with it?

Gold performs two monetary functions. First, it serves as a specie base for the monetary system. Secondly, it serves as the medium for settling international balances. These are distinct and separate functions. The present gold stock of the United States is about $15,000,000,000. The question you ask, therefore, is, Is $15,000,000,000 of gold more than enough to accomplish these two functions which gold now performs in our economic system?

It is doubtless true that we have more gold than we need to provide a specie base for our monetary system. Our laws require that a 40-percent reserve in gold certificates be held against Federal Reserve notes in circulation and a 35-percent reserve in gold certificates or lawful money against deposits of Federal Reserve banks. These legal-reserve requirements are based on the assumption that gold-reserve requirements operate as a control of the volume of means of payment, as a protection against excessive issue of notes and expansion of bank credit. At present, however, gold and gold-certificate holdings are so far in excess of these legal requirements that they can hardly be said to constitute a protection against undue expansion of our currency and credit. We now have enough gold to permit an enormous expansion of credit and currency even after generous allowance for the outflow of gold that might accompany such an expansion. Legal-reserve requirements do not of themselves necessarily protect us against an undue expansion of the volume of money and the monetary authorities must be prepared, when and if the occasion arises, to apply appropriate supplementary control. This is especially likely to be true when gold holdings are as great as they now are.

But it is desirable that the reserves be above the minimum required by law. Otherwise, in a period of business recovery the limitations on the expansion of notes and deposits which the gold reserve would impose would operate to curb the rise in business activity, or an outflow of gold would tend to initiate a contraction of credit, irrespective of the legitimate needs of business. It is clear, therefore, that some excess of gold above the legal minimum is needed to protect our domestic economy against effects of fortuitous inflows and outflows of gold. We now, however, have more gold than is necessary to insure this protection.

The second and more important monetary function of gold is its employment as a means of settling international balances among nations. Gold has been used for this purpose from time immemorial, and modern governments have as yet found no satisfactory substitute; nor is there any sign that a satisfactory substitute will be found in the near future.

Important commercial countries which carry little or no gold stocks have difficulties in settling their international payments. They have to see to it that their imports and exports are maintained in a certain relationship to each other. To achieve that and to keep their foreign-exchange rates from fluctuating wildly they frequently have to maintain strict exchange controls so as to restrict merchandise imports and the movement of capital.

Small countries, which are not precluded by political and prestige considerations from holding their reserves in the form of foreign-exchange assets, can get along more or less satisfactorily without gold. But they can do so only because the countries whose currencies they hold as reserve assets do have large amounts of gold reserves.

Some countries (operating with very little gold or foreign-exchange assets) have been pointed to as illustrations of the phenomenon that countries can carry on foreign trade and settle international transactions without resort to gold, and that gold is rapidly becoming obsolete even for this monetary role. Those who make this claim completely misread the experience of these countries. These very countries do in fact need and prize gold more and seek it more anxiously than do countries that use gold freely to settle balances of international payments. It is their inability to obtain gold, which forces them to adopt a far less satisfactory alternative method of adjusting their balance of international payments, namely, the adoption of strict exchange control, of clearing agreements, of barter schemes, and the imposition of severe penalties against evasion and all the other business and liberty-destroying procedures necessary to make the system work. There is no one thing which demonstrates more effectively the superiority of gold as a means for settling international balances than the experience of these countries that have tried to get along without it.

Without either gold or exchange controls exchange rates would be very unstable. Any change in the balance of payments would have to be taken care of by international borrowing or lending or the exchange rates would have to move to the point where the sums to be paid and the sums to be received were equated. Because we have abundant gold reserves we do not have to apply exchange restrictions, and broad changes in our balance of international payments can take place without interfering with the stability of the dollar exchange.

All these points have been granted by some critics, but they maintain that to fulfill both these functions much less than $15,000,000,000 worth of gold would suffice. There is some merit to that contention, yet the future of international political and economic relationships is much too uncertain to justify our taking the steps which would be necessary if we were determined to reduce our gold holdings.

One important factor to bear in mind in considering our gold policy is the psychological reaction of the public to a continuing loss of gold. Should a country be undergoing loss of gold over a considerable period of time, there is likely to result impaired confidence in that country's currency and in the stability of its monetary system long before it has exhausted the gold it possessed in excess of legal or traditional reserve requirements. This has happened time and again throughout the world. Without greater ability to forecast future political and economic developments than is vouchsafed us, it is impossible to say with certainty that we have too much gold. We can say with some assurance, however, that we have enough gold to meet all likely contingencies, and that we are in a strong position to defend the stability of our credit structure and of the dollar against any quick change in our international balance of payments, including any large withdrawal of foreign capital.

The danger that gold will no longer be used as a medium of international exchange is so remote as not to merit serious consideration. Other countries will surely continue to accept gold in the settlement of favorable balances of payments, because gold is as important to them as it is to us. England has over $3,000,000,000 of gold. France has almost as much; Holland, Switzerland, and Belgium and many other countries have what are for them large holdings of gold. It is in the interest of these countries as much as it is in our own interest to continue to rely on gold as an essential part of their monetary system. Moreover, we must not overlook the fact that nations producing substantial quantities of gold have important vested interests in the continuation of gold as a monetary metal. The British Empire alone produces about half the world's gold. Even countries that produce relatively small amounts of gold find that those small amounts are an important source of national income to them.

8. Isn't it true that foreigners are getting shares of our productive industries and giving us in return gold that we have no use for?

The amount of American securities which have been recently acquired by residents of foreign countries has been much less than is generally supposed. During the past 4 years the total of net foreign purchases of American securities amounted to only one and two-tenths billion, as follows:

1935.....	$317,000,000
1936.....	601,000,000
1937.....	245,000,000
1938.....	49,000,000

There was, in addition, an increase in direct investments by foreigners as reported by the Department of Commerce of about $175,000,000 during this period. Altogether, the total amount of investments by foreigners in American securities or directly in American industry during the past 4 years has been less than one-fifth of the gold sent here during these years.

The sums do not, of course, represent the total of foreign capital which has come into the United States. Short-term funds owned by residents of foreign countries increased by one and eight-tenths billion. The bulk of these were demand deposits, which do not constitute acquisitions of shares in American industry and which do not earn any interest.

The acquisition of American securities by foreigners paid for with gold represents a transaction which admittedly is, under existing circumstances, of dubious advantage to the United States. Yet, given the relatively minor importance of the problem to date, we have not been able to convince ourselves that any of the possible remedies which we have so far examined gave promise of sufficient benefit to the national economy to offset their disadvantages.

On the other hand, it should be pointed out that if foreign holders of American securities liquidate their holdings and withdraw the proceeds, either gold or goods (and services) would necessarily be the resultant medium of withdrawal. If the vehicle of transmission were gold, its loss, in view of our large gold holdings could, of course, be regarded with equanimity. If the medium of transmission were goods, either because of direct purchases with the proceeds of the funds or because of the operations of the adjustment process, the resultant increase to our exports at a time when there exists a large volume of unemployed labor and other idle resources would have favorable effects on our economy.

9. What action, if any, should be taken with respect to the gold situation? Should we, for example, return to the gold standard of pre-1933?

The maldistribution of the world's gold is a reflection of the disturbed economic situation throughout the world and the chaotic international political situation. Redistribution can come only with progress toward the solution of the basic problems confronting world international relations.

In our study of this matter we have examined literally scores of proposals directed toward possible action to redistribute the world's gold. The major conclusion we have drawn is that any measure which would take the form of restrictions on the flow of gold into this country would have, at this time, detrimental effects upon our economy.

What disadvantages may be associated with the gold inflow are fortunately only of minor magnitude, and should, moreover, be attributed to the factors causing that inflow rather than to the inflow itself. Foreign ownership of American securities may, however, serve as a source of disturbance to our security markets in times of stress; similarly with short-term foreign capital sent here. On the other hand, the third factor responsible for the gold inflow to the United States—our export excess—does yield a gain.

The large inflow of gold in recent years has been a major factor in increasing excess bank reserves. These reserves do in some degree operate to stimulate an expansion of loans by banks and to keep the interest-rate structure lower, both developments helping somewhat to promote a higher level of business activity. Nonetheless, the prospect of continued large inflows of gold has been a cause of some concern on the part of those who consider a large volume of excess reserves as constituting a potential danger of inflation, though I do not regard this problem as one of immediate import.

The only immediately disturbing aspect of the gold problem is the loss of gold by foreign countries. The countries losing gold may be adversely affected by the loss, and some of the adverse effects would impinge indirectly on us. This is to be deplored, but the factors producing this situation are external to us and beyond our control, acting alone.

With respect to the suggestion that the United States return to the gold standard of pre-1933, I must state definitely that such a move would be harmful to the American people and of no value to the people of other countries. In the first place, a return to the pre-1933 gold standard would mean a return to the $20.67-an-ounce price for gold. This, in the absence of similar changes in the gold value of other currencies, would represent a depreciation of approximately 70 percent in all foreign currencies in terms of the dollar.

It is obvious that an increase in the cost of the dollar to the foreigner by 70 percent and a decrease in the cost of foreign currencies to the American importer by 40 percent would seriously disrupt our foreign and domestic trade. Price movements are not so general or so rapid as to adjust economic conditions quickly to changes in exchange rates, and such movements as would occur would take the form of falling prices, particularly prices of agricultural products and raw materials. From experience we know that such price movements have disastrous effects upon incomes, profits, and the level of business activity. We might be precipitated into a depression rivaling the 1930-33 experience. There can be no question, therefore, of returning to a gold dollar with the pre-1933 content. The answer to question 6 above contains a full discussion of the foreseeable effects which would result from any substantial increase in the gold content of the dollar.

Even if what were proposed were a return not to the old gold value but to a pre-1933 gold standard with the present gold content of $35 an ounce, such a step would be unwise at this time. Our present monetary system differs from the pre-1933 gold standard in three respects other than gold content. First, our currency is not convertible into gold coin; secondly, there are Government controls over the movement of gold in and out of the country; and, thirdly, there is Executive authority to change the gold content of the dollar.

Convertibility of currency would, in my opinion, have no substantial advantages. Virtually every country in the world has recognized this fact and has withdrawn the privilege. For in normal times there is nothing to be gained by the right to convert currency into gold, whereas at all times convertibility has the potential disadvantage of creating a possible source of internal gold drain which would come into play at the very time when it would be most injurious. Internal hoarding of specie reserves has been, in the experience of many countries, one of the most important reasons for the weakening of currencies. Though the prospect of such a contingency in the United States seems at this time remote, it would, nevertheless, always be a possibility under a convertible currency system. Moreover, in the event that there should develop an emergency situation calling for a further change in the gold content of the dollar, the existence of private gold holdings would create unnecessary difficulties.

At present the movement of gold out of the country is in effect subject only to the restriction that it must be for the purpose of settling international balances. Gold moves freely to satisfy legitimate commercial and financial needs. The present powers of control over the movement of gold provide a safeguard that can instantly be used in the contingency of an international crisis.

The power to change the gold content of the dollar should be lodged in an authority which can, in case of necessity, act swiftly and in a manner which will minimize the disturbances resulting from any change. This power should always be available; its existence contributes to the maintenance of stable exchange relationships, which makes the exercise of the power unnecessary.

It is important to realize that rumors of an impending change in the value of a currency, or any public discussion by responsible officials that such a change might be made, would in themselves be enough to induce large flows of capital either into the country or out of the country, depending upon whether the prospect is for an increase in the value of the dollar or for a decrease in the gold content of the dollar. Discussions in committees would be advance notice to speculators that such action might take place. The mere fact that it might take place would be sufficient to induce the flow of capital, because if the change did not actually occur, the speculation would have cost only the small charges attending any exchange transaction. Indeed, congressional discussion would stimulate speculators to engage in activities of a sort which would of themselves tend to force Congress to take the action which had been in contemplation, even if on its own merits and in the absence of the situation created by the operations of the speculators, a negative decision would have been in order. The liquidation of foreign holdings of American capital might, under such circumstances, easily be powerful enough to disrupt the security exchanges and to introduce a chaotic situation in markets and in business generally. Since the prospect of devaluation would arise only under circumstances which were disturbing in any case, the outflow of capital would simply make bad things worse.

It therefore appears desirable that the Executive should have the power to alter the gold content of the national currency unit, in the public interest, and within clearly prescribed limits, as it is in most of the countries in the world, so that if an emergency situation should require its exercise it could be exercised quickly and without the necessity of prior public discussion and its concomitant invitation to speculative activities.

Sincerely,

HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. ROBERT L. WAGNER,
United States Senate.

OCTOBER 24, 1939.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I should like to answer in some detail the questions in your letter of October 17, so as to clarify certain aspects of problems relating to gold.

You write:

"I assume that you are continuing to purchase at $35 an ounce all foreign gold that is offered. In view of depreciated foreign currencies, is not this equivalent to paying considerably more than $35 an ounce so far as the foreign seller is concerned?"

I am uncertain what you mean by this question. It is subject to several different interpretations and to make certain that you obtain the information you ask I will endeavor to answer each of them separately.

1. Does the question ask whether the foreign seller of gold receives more purchasing power over goods and services here than he did prior to depreciation? If that is the sense of your question, then the answer is "No." The $35 per ounce (less one-fourth of 1 percent) which the foreign seller of gold receives probably represents less, and certainly not more, purchasing power in terms of goods and services in this country than it did before the depreciation of currencies in recent months. Such purchasing power of $35 in the United States varies, of course, with changes in prices of goods and services in the United States. Since most goods and services that can be purchased here by a resident of a foreign country have risen in price during the past 2 months, it follows that the foreign seller of gold probably gets less goods and services for his $35 now than he did a few months ago.

2. Does the question ask whether the foreigner can get more units of his own currency for gold by selling it in the United States than by selling it in his own country? If this is the sense of your question, again the answer is "No." We pay no higher price for gold (allowing for commissions, handling charges, etc.) than other countries do. After a foreign seller of gold converts the dollars he obtains for his gold into sterling, for example, he finds that he has approximately the same amount of money as he would have had if he had sold that gold in London. (For a further explanation of this I refer you to pp. 7, 8, and 9 of my letter to Senator WAGNER, dated March 22, 1939, a copy of which is enclosed for your convenience.)

3. Does the question ask whether the foreign seller of gold gets more units of his local currency for his gold now than he did before the depreciation of his currency? If this is the sense of the question, the answer is clearly "Yes." That is exactly what depreciation of a currency in terms of gold means, namely, that each unit of a depreciated currency is exchangeable for less gold.

4. Does the question ask whether the greater number of units of the depreciated currency which the foreign seller obtains for his gold can purchase more goods and services at home than could the smaller number of units he obtained for his gold before depreciation? The answer to this question is probably "Yes." Prices in the country of a depreciated currency do not usually rise as much as the currency depreciates for a considerable period of time, if at all. During that period the holder or producer of gold will get more local goods and services for an ounce of gold than he did before. But he gets more goods only if he buys goods at home; furthermore, he gets more goods for an ounce of gold not because we continue to pay $35 an ounce for gold but because his own country gives more units of its currency for an ounce of gold.

When taken in the context of your whole letter one further possible interpretation of your question suggests itself. You may be asking whether the recent depreciation of foreign currencies will of itself lead to an increased inflow of gold. If this is the sense of your question, the answer is probably "No." It is, of course, impossible to foretell at this time the total effect of a Europe at war upon our balance of payments. The specific effect of the recent depreciations of foreign currencies, however, would clearly seem to operate in the direction of a reduction in gold offerings. Depreciation of foreign currencies vis-à-vis the dollar means that American goods and services are less attractive to the foreigner because he must give more of his own currency in exchange for a dollar's worth of merchandise than formerly. In other words, the depreciation of foreign currencies is a factor which operates in the direction of reducing our exports to and increasing our imports from the countries involved. Thus, the effect of the change will tend to reduce our favorable balance of trade and consequently such inflow of gold as may be attributable to our export surplus. It is true that price changes may in time offset the effect on the relative attractiveness of foreign and American goods initiated by the depreciation of foreign currencies. But even in normal times this adjustment usually does not take place for some time.

You ask the further question:

"If we put our foreign trade with belligerents on a strict 'cash and carry' basis, will it not be likely to substantially increase this inflow of foreign gold, perhaps to so dangerous an extent that we finally shall practically monopolize the world's gold supply?"

The prohibition of credits to belligerent governments may possibly have the effect of reducing our exports to belligerent countries. This might, in turn, reduce the value of our total exports compared with what our exports would be were the prohibition not included in the Neutrality Act. Were the belligerent governments to purchase some of their imports from the United States on credit, a portion of the payments due us might be postponed. However, whether this postponement would result even in a temporary reduction in the inflow of gold cannot be forecast because—

(1) It is not known what proportion of the dollars used for payments would be acquired from the sale to us of gold and what proportion would be acquired from other sources.

(2) It is not known whether an extension of credits to belligerents would result in greater purchases from the United States or whether there would simply be a substitution of some credit purchases for cash purchases. Only in the latter instance would it be possible for part of the inflow of gold to the United States to be postponed. In the former case it would mean that the gold inflow would be the same over the short period of time and would be greater at some subsequent time when credits were liquidated.

You ask this further question with respect to gold:

"Would this (increased inflow of gold) not seriously threaten the world's subsequent return to the use of monetary gold, and thus relatively threaten the ultimate value of our own enormous gold hoard?"

This war demonstrates, if any demonstration were needed, that gold constitutes the best form in which foreign exchange resources can be held. Even under the most difficult conditions of war, belligerent governments which possess gold can buy with it anything that is for sale.

The new situation in world trade brought about by the war in Europe will, of course, introduce some changes in the distribution of gold among the nations of the world. Belligerent countries will probably lose gold, but numerous neutral countries, which now have little gold, may be put in a position to increase their holdings as a result of improvements in their trade balances. As a consequence, the war may well have the effect of causing a wider distribution of gold among the countries of the world. Such an increase in gold holdings by many countries would give more countries a stake in the continuation of gold as a medium of international payments. The gold-producing countries, of course—including the British Empire, which now produces half the world's gold—will continue to have a vital interest in the use of gold as a monetary metal.

These considerations, as well as others, indicate that gold will emerge from this disturbed period with added prestige as the international medium of exchange. For further discussion of the future usefulness of gold as a monetary metal, you may wish to refer to pages 16, 17, 18, and 19 of my letter to Senator WAGNER referred to above.

Your last question on gold relates to a suggested change in our monetary policy. You ask:

"Should not the purchase of foreign gold be curtailed and repriced at least for the period of the war?"

I am not clear whether by repricing gold you have in mind an increase or a decrease in the price of gold. I judge from the context of your letter, however, that you are inquiring about the effects of a reduction in the dollar price of gold.

My views with respect to the consequences of reductions in the price of gold are fully set forth in my letter to Senator WAGNER referred to above. The discussion appears on pages 13 to 16 of that letter, and I think it may be appropriately reread in connection with your inquiry.

You raise the question of the advisability of reducing the price of gold "for the period of the war." Any substantial change in the price of gold which is known to be temporary would have seriously disrupting influences on trade and international capital flows. It would introduce a still greater risk element in business relations with foreign countries and would, moreover, increase world speculation in dollar exchange.

Sincerely,

HENRY MORGENTHAU, JR.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

(Enclosures.)

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement by Mr. A. A. Berle, Jr., in which he says that United States gold may help rebuild shattered Europe, and that we may have to give it away in our own interest to soothe social unrest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

BERLE SAYS UNITED STATES' GOLD MAY HELP REBUILD SHATTERED EUROPE—WE MAY HAVE TO GIVE IT AWAY IN OUR OWN INTEREST TO SOOTHE SOCIAL UNREST AFTER WAR, HE HOLDS

NEW HAVEN, CONN., January 31.—A free gift of some of America's accumulated gold and use of the resources of the Federal Reserve System to help reconstruct Europe after the war were advanced as possibilities tonight by Adolf A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State.

When peace comes, he said, the United States will face heavy responsibility for a return of the world to economic sanity.

Predicting as a "foregone conclusion" that the present war will be followed by "a great movement of social unrest," Berle told the political union of Yale University:

"It seems fantastic today to suggest handing over some of our accumulated gold as a free gift to reestablish international currency, to let other nations set their houses in order, and thereby reestablish trade and normal life. But this may not seem nearly so fantastic a few years hence.

"It seems impossible today to think of using the enormous and yet untapped resources of the Federal Reserve System as a means of rebuilding the shattered life of another continent; but when the time actually comes and we are faced with that contingency, we may find that the idea looks more like an immediate necessity than a fairy tale.

"It may even be—strange though it seems—that by dealing with some of these problems we shall learn at length that we hold the tools in our hand to remedy many of the injustices in our own social life."

He suggested that the United States might adopt the following methods of contributing to the "reconstruction of an ordered world":

"Sending goods which we produce in abundance to places where they are needed * * * paid for or not, human suffering must be relieved.

"Helping to set up a considerable part of the world in business again. We may do this because we should hope—and I think rightly—that the result will contribute to our own economic health.

"American and foreign public-health units working side by side and not trying to assess the race, wealth, or origin of the people whom they endeavor to protect from disease.

"International lawyers endeavoring to resolve conflicts so as to reopen contact between groups and individuals.

"Transport pools designed primarily to assure that goods are promptly taken to the places where they are most needed.

"Banks and bankers pooling their resources so that the materials of life are once more everywhere available."

POLITICAL CONDITIONS IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, political integrity is as essential to the preservation of our democracy as are patriotism and loyalty.

We in this Chamber are all patriotic Americans sworn to uphold the Constitution according to our best understanding. We take that as a matter of course. But above and beyond this formal, definite commitment lies a very essential obligation to play fair in politics. Once that sense of political integrity is lost, once organizations fall into the hands of unprincipled racketeers, once the political system disintegrates so that one boss controls both parties, the very fundamentals of our Government are endangered. Liberty is displaced by political dictatorship.

Pennsylvania was long afflicted by such one-party rule, with the Democratic Party a slave of its Republican masters. It was only in 1932 and 1934 that this sleeping giant broke its bonds, and a healthy two-party system was restored to the Keystone State. As a result, we made more progress toward good government in 4 years than in the previous 40 years.

Now I see an attempt to destroy all that has been accomplished. I see a sinister effort to recapture and emasculate the Democratic Party. To add to the danger, the Republican Party is now dominated and controlled by an underworld character who wants to take over the Democratic Party as well. I refer to Moses L. Annenberg, publisher of the Philadelphia Inquirer, czar of race-track information service, lately indicted for the biggest income-tax evasion on record—the amount involved being over $5,000,000—and for bribery.

His bitter attacks on me culminated in a lead editorial in yesterday's Philadelphia Inquirer in which I am denounced as an undesirable primary candidate. But this brazen attempt of this Republican daily to dictate the Democratic candidate would be ludicrous if it were not for the character of the Inquirer ownership and its sinister purpose.

All of us believe the day is far off when ruthless and unprincipled men, with gangster morals and underworld background, will seize control of our Government. Yet we have seen it happen abroad, and I have seen it in my own State. Now—today—it threatens to extend to the National Capitol itself.

A few years ago no one would have dreamed that an associate of Chicago mobsters, armed with millions gained from an illegal racing-wire monopoly, would be able to seize control of the government of a great State such as Pennsylvania.

A few years ago all of us would have laughed at the Annenberg 4-year plan, cynically and brazenly declared when he bought the Philadelphia Inquirer in 1936, control of the Philadelphia Republican organization and municipal government, control of the Pennsylvania Republican organization and State government, and, ultimately, control of the Republican National Convention in 1940. Yet today Annenberg's word is law in Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, and he will control the Pennsylvania delegation to the Republican National Convention.

He has also boasted openly that through his underworld associations he will exercise a controlling influence with the Illinois and New York delegations, for he has extensive interests in both Chicago and New York City. This, should it materialize, would give him control of three vital delegations, which would mean that the party of Abraham Lincoln could not nominate any candidate until personally approved by Moe Annenberg.

If the Republican Party chooses to accept the leadership of this man, that is the Republican Party's business. It is my business to prevent him from wrecking the Democratic Party in my own State. It is my duty to stop him from achieving his sinister political objectives.

For weeks there have been references in the Pennsylvania Republican press, but most especially in Annenberg's journal, to my candidacy. Unidentified "leaders" of the Democratic Party in Pennsylvania have been quoted at length in opposition to me and to the liberal New Deal principles for which I stand.

As a culmination of a series of inspired articles, manufactured special stories and features of all kinds directed against every liberal movement in America, Annenberg in his editorial of yesterday finally came into the open as the fountainhead of the opposition to my candidacy.

This editorial is marked by a bitter personal attack upon me as unfit for the high office I hold—not because of my conduct in this Chamber or in the course of my political duties, but because of my political affiliations and activities.

This so-called bible of Pennsylvania Republicanism has the unparalleled effrontery to tell the Democrats of Pennsylvania—whose leaders it was doing its utmost to put in prison only a short while ago—whom they shall or shall not nominate.

Party raiding in Pennsylvania is forbidden by law. This is an attempt to raid the Democratic Party through the press. One is illegal, the other is the most shameless violation of common decency and journalistic ethics even seen in America.

The obvious purpose of the Annenberg attack is to blitzkrieg the Democratic Party by demoralizing its leadership, by fostering suspicions and prejudices, by cajoling uncertain Democratic leaders and frightening others, by holding out veiled promises of support for those who play its game.

The object of such a campaign is clear—to reduce the Democratic Party in Pennsylvania to futility, to involve it in such internal warfare that it will not survive the battle; to leave nothing of it but an ineffectual machine controlled by the same privileged interests which support and maintain the Republican organization.

Annenberg's editorial itself gives the game away, when it says that my nomination for reelection will insure a Republican victory. Who could believe for a moment that Annenberg's newspaper, or any other bitterly partisan Republican journal, would go out of its way to stop a candidate the Republicans could lick?

Such philanthropy, such devotion to public-spirited service, such nonpartisanship, is hardly to be expected from the Philadelphia Inquirer. It presumes to tell the Democratic leaders what they should do; as if its own opposition were not the surest and most positive evidence that it fears my candidacy. And I serve notice that it has reason to fear that candidacy, for I propose to give no quarter in the fight against Annenberg and the underworld type of public morality he represents.

Annenberg's concern over the danger of my nomination arises from a single and well-founded fear, the fear—yes, the certainty—that if I am nominated Annenberg's candidate will be defeated.

I call attention to Annenberg, his Philadelphia Inquirer, and to his most recent editorial diatribe for a particular reason.

Annenberg constitutes a menace to our American institutions. Our easy-going freedom and tolerance, which he not only enjoys but exploits, make it possible for a great metropolitan daily to be perverted to serve the ends of a sinister adventurer. He diverts it from the proper functions of a free press and uses it as an instrument for the advancement of his scheme to seize power over government.

Should he succeed, the rise of his new political underworld will mark the end of decency in government, and the end of democracy as we have known it.

The Republican leadership in Pennsylvania cannot disavow Annenberg. He owns it, body and soul. No Republican leader—and many are decent, self-respecting men—dares to face the journalistic blasts and the destruction of character which would result if they were to oppose him. They know he will stop at nothing. He achieved his monopoly in the underworld by just such terroristic tactics.

But I do not propose to be intimidated. I have fought for the integrity of the Democratic Party for more than 40 years, and I am not going to be stopped now—even by the enmity of one of the most vicious characters ever to rise from the Chicago underworld.

CONFIRMATION OF JUDICIAL NOMINATIONS

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as in executive session I should like the Senate at this time consider and confirm two judicial nominations in Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the first nomination referred to by the Senator from Virginia.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Armistead M. Dobie, of Virginia, to be judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alfred D. Barksdale to be United States district judge for the western district of Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these two judicial nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be immediately notified.

CONTINUATION OF NEW DEAL LEGISLATION

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, wars abroad must not overshadow economic problems at home. No one will deny that the wars in Europe and Asia present serious problems, but problems of foreign policy must not cause us to lose sight of the economic condition of certain classes of our own people.

This administration, under the wise leadership of President Roosevelt, has launched a number of reforms which were long overdue. In that regard, this has been no ordinary administration with merely the normal amount of new legislation which is to be expected with the passing of 7 years. But in this administration, it has been necessary to make up for the neglect of many years past when our Government followed a policy of laissez faire while time marched on.

Mr. President, this is not merely another administration but this administration marks a new era. It has been necessary to crowd into a few years the greatest number of social and economic reforms ever attempted in the same period of time by the American Government—reforms so far reaching that the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt to the Presidency of the United States marks a new epoch in American history.

Also it was necessary to devote much of the first part of this administration to recovery before reform could be undertaken. Therefore, this administration has not had time to perfect and improve the many important measures which have been adopted during its tenure.

The serious critics of the administration have advocated amendments to much of the legislation which has been enacted, but very few, if any, of them are advocating outright repeal of these reforms.

If these reforms are to be given a fair chance, they should be amended and refined by those who initiated them in the first instance. In other words, the amending should be done by the friends of the new legislation, and in most cases, the original sponsors of this liberal legislation are themselves advocating certain changes for the purpose of improving these measures.

It is true that the smoke of battle abroad forms a dark cloud on the horizon, yet we must not lose sight of the importance of finishing the work we have begun at home. We have launched an entirely new program for social and economic betterment. There is still work to do on this program before it can withstand the shock of an after-war depression.

Those who initiated and sponsored this program are the ones who should machine down the rough spots and perfect the work which they have so well begun. Unless these measures are strengthened by friendly hands, some of them will be swept away in the rush to sell war materials abroad and many of the gains for humanity will be lost.

There are those who are already looking to the war in Europe as a means of solving our problem of unemployment. There are those who are expecting the European demand for agricultural products to solve our farm problem. It is true that wars abroad may temporarily increase the demand for our goods, but war creates only a temporary market. Any money which we receive as a result of war has been rightly referred to by President Roosevelt as "fool's gold." Any temporary prosperity which results from war can be nothing more than a fool's paradise.

Suppose we should abandon some of the reforms which lead to more permanent prosperity and should rely upon the artificial prosperity resulting from wars abroad, and then that prosperity should suddenly turn to ashes. What then? We would have frittered away the opportunity to make permanent our gains, and the second stage of our depression would be worse than the first.

The temporary demand for our goods abroad is deceiving many of our people. It has created a situation which is being seized upon by those who are opposed to the entire program of the Roosevelt administration as an opportunity to sweep away the reforms we have initiated. They argue with great persuasiveness that the need for the legislation has passed and therefore the legislation should be abandoned. The argument is so appealing that many of those most aided by these measures are being deceived by present conditions.

These conditions are artificial. These markets are temporary. After the war, what then? When the soldiers of Europe and Asia turn from fighting to farming, what will the American farmer do if he has abandoned his farm program? What will the wage earners do when the munition factories shut down, if they have no unemployment program to fall back on? We must make good the present opportunity to build an all-weather economy which can stand the strain of the backwash after war.

Certainly one of the most important problems confronting the American Congress today is that of agriculture, and the condition of the farmer is indissolubly connected with the condition of the wage earner. The problem of unemployment is blood kin to the problem of farm prices.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I wonder if the Senator would mind my interrupting him to make a suggestion. If we reach a point where our exports are largely of materials which must be used for war purposes, then when the time comes that the nations purchasing those war materials see that our economy is based upon such exports, will they not be in a position much more easily to involve us in a European conflict than they would be if we were able to maintain our war economy without specializing in the export of war materials?

Mr. LEE. I believe that is decidedly correct, and I thank the Senator for making that observation at this time.

Mr. President, our farm program today will not stand alone. If Congress should fail to appropriate money out of the Treasury for the present farm program it would collapse.

We must have a more permanent farm program. We must have a self-financing farm program. We must have a farm program that will carry its own weight. We must have a farm program that can stand the repercussions of an after-war slump.

Then again we must set up a farm-tenant program that will rehabilitate the farm tenants faster than they are being dispossessed.

Furthermore, we must adopt a self-liquidating public-works program.

We must expand and preserve our soil-conservation program.

We must establish freight-rate schedules on a basis of fairness and justice which cannot be assailed.

We must expand our old-age security program on a basis so logical that it cannot be attacked. Now is the time to make secure our gains in all these social and economic fields.

Great drives are being made in this country for donations to aid Finland. Indeed, that is a worthy cause. Such campaigns represent the generous and sympathetic attitude of America toward the distressed. I wish to add my voice of approval to such humanitarian campaigns but may I at the same time call attention to the distress and suffering among our own people?

May I point out that the increase in big-scale farming in America is sweeping tenant farmers from the land and sending them to town to seek employment on the relief rolls?

May I call attention to the deplorable condition of our sharecroppers? I can see them strung out along the highways now, as I have seen them many times—whole families of them, the father carrying some of their belongings, the mother carrying a baby, and the children trailing along behind. I have often asked myself, What will they eat for their next meal? Yes; what did they have for their last meal? Where will they spend the night? Who knows? They are just moving on. Where to? They themselves do not know.

I must remind the Senate that, in spite of the temporary upturn in business, there is still great human suffering here at home. One morning a poor, old man's frozen body is found by the side of a pile of ashes. Does not that tell the story of misery and suffering? This very night children here in America will go to bed hungry. Indeed, some of them will not have a bed in which to sleep because their fathers and mothers are unable to get employment.

Then, again, let me remind you, Mr. President, of the coal mine tragedies where the coal miners have been entombed by what I understand to be preventable disasters.

I would not minimize the seriousness of the foreign situation. I would not detract from the concern for suffering humanity abroad, but in all fairness I must call attention to these serious domestic problems.

I am willing to vote appropriations for national defense, but I am unwilling that the Congress shall adjourn until we have provided work for the unemployed. I am willing to vote appropriations to increase the Military Establishment, but I am unwilling to have Congress adjourn until we have increased and stabilized the farmer's income. I am willing to vote an increase of the naval power of the United States, but I am unwilling to have Congress adjourn until we have increased the purchasing power of the underprivileged in America.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to make the statement that the mine disaster in Kentucky was caused by something that could have been prevented.

Mr. LEE. I so understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator know anything about the facts?

Mr. LEE. No; I do not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do. The report of the State mine inspector showed that the explosion was caused by a man using a permissive explosive and bringing it in contact with a live wire. The man was found some distance from the point of the explosion, with his leg blown off, and almost blown in two himself. I was present a short time afterward, and made an inspection and received the report. The Senator's advice about the matter is incorrect.

Mr. LEE. I appreciate the correction from the Senator from Kentucky.

E. C. BEAVER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 323) for the relief of E. C. Beaver, who suffered loss on account of the Lawton, Okla., fire, 1917, which were, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "Beaver as compensation in full" and insert "Beaver, of Tulsa, Okla., in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States"; and to amend the title so as to read "An act for the relief of E. C. Beaver."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSOULA BREWING CO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 766) for the relief of the Missoula Brewing Co., which were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "is" and insert "be, and he is hereby"; and on page 1, lines 6 and 7, to strike out "representing the amount paid" and insert "in full settlement of all claims against the United States because of payment of said amount".

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HATCH obtained the floor.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	George	Lee	Schwartz
Andrews	Gerry	Lucas	Schwellenbach
Ashurst	Gibson	Lundeen	Shipstead

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today marks the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Supreme Court of the United States. We have just returned from the Supreme Court, where appropriate ceremonies celebrating this auspicious occasion have been concluded. The Judiciary Committees of both branches of Congress attended those ceremonies, paying due and proper respect to the judicial branch of the Government. Eloquent and able addresses were delivered by the Attorney General of the United States and by Mr. Beardsley, president of the American Bar Association. The Chief Justice of the United States responded with remarks eminently befitting the dignity of the high office he occupies and the traditions and ideals of the Court. It would hardly seem proper, Mr. President, to let this day pass without some word being said on the floor of the Senate paying at least some measure of tribute to that branch of government which celebrates the anniversary of its birth today.

Fifty years ago, in speaking at the ceremonies held in the city of New York commemorating the one-hundredth anniversary of the Supreme Court, a former President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, said:

We are accustomed to express on every fit occasion our reverence for the virtue and patriotism in which the foundations of the Republic were laid, and to rejoice in the blessings vouchsafed to us under free institutions.

As Mr. Cleveland spoke 50 years ago, so may we well speak today. We should fittingly express this day our reverence for the virtue and patriotism in which the foundations of the Republic were laid. With even greater fervor we can well rejoice today in the blessings vouchsafed to us under the free institutions of our Government.

It was only yesterday, it seems, at the beginning of the World War, that Sir Edward Grey sadly said:

One by one the lights of civilization are being extinguished. They shall not be relighted in our generation.

Today as we look across the seas at the Old World we wonder if once more the lights of civilization are being extinguished. For a decade or more we have watched the fall of governments. We have seen liberty die in other lands. We have seen free people and free governments destroyed, and, even as I speak, a small but a brave and fearless people fight against the advancing hordes of an aggressor who would seize and destroy the right of a free country to rule and govern herself.

As we see these things we almost say, as Romain Rolland said during the years of the last World War:

A sacrilegious conflict which shows a maddened Europe ascending its funeral pyre, and, like Hercules, destroying itself with its own hands.

As these scenes unfold and as tyranny stalks abroad in other lands and free institutions are obliterated from almost every country in the world, I repeat we may well pause for a moment today and pay our reverence and respect for the "virtue and patriotism in which the foundations of the Republic were laid."

In laying those foundations of this Republic our fathers proceeded not by accident. It is no accident that freedom survives in America today. The founders of the Republic were men who understood the true science of government. Passionately they believed that powers of government must be separated. As often expressed by them, "the accumulation of all the powers of government in the same hands, whether of one, or a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elected," could justly be "pronounced the very definition of tyranny." So believing, they laid out the plan upon which the structure of our Government rests today.

It was not a new plan. Students of government, they were familiar with every form and theory of government which existed in the world. In another address delivered on the occasion of the one-hundredth anniversary of the Supreme Court, it was said:

A division of the powers of government was not a political device newly invented by the statesmen who framed the Constitution of the United States. Aristotle, in the fourth book of his Politics, observes that in every polity there are three departments, the suitable form of each of which the wise lawgiver must consider, and according to the variation of which one State shall differ from another. These he describes as, first, the assembly for public affairs; second, the officers of the State, including their powers and mode of appointment; and, third, the judging or judicial department.

Following this and other plans and being ever mindful of their own mistakes and errors under the Articles of Confederation, our fathers laid the foundations of this Republic. And from their work came the Supreme Court of the United States, the anniversary of whose birth we celebrate today.

In the Supreme Court there was something new and unique in governments of men. Of course, courts of justice had long existed. The statesmen who wrote the Constitution knew well the history of the judiciary. They knew its weaknesses and they knew its strength. They knew its faults and its frailties. English courts had not always functioned according to the principles of English law, in which the colonists devoutly believed. Yet the writers of the Constitution gave birth to the most powerful court known to men, the Supreme Court of the United States, and created it as a separate and independent arm or branch of the Federal Government.

Of that Court, De Tocqueville said:

In the nations of Europe the courts of justice are called upon to try the controversies of private individuals, but the Supreme Court of the United States summons sovereign powers to its bar.

Under the authority of the Constitution but, as the president of the American Bar Association observed this morning, with "no guards, palaces, or treasures, no arms but truth and wisdom, and no splendor but the justice and publicity of its judgments," the Supreme Court of the United States has pursued its course for 150 years. Not always right, of course, not divine, but very human, the Supreme Court has met the multitude of questions presented to it throughout the course of its history and has builded a body of law upon which the freedom of our institutions rests today. I can pay the Court no greater tribute than this. If I spoke for hours and voiced all the high and lofty sentiments which have been expressed throughout the years by lawyers and judges commemorating the work of the Supreme Court of the United States, I could speak no greater tribute than I have paid when I say the Supreme Court has helped to build, preserve, and keep free government for the people of the United States.

After all, is there anything else that matters? If free government ever fails here, if tyranny conquers this country, if the right of self-rule ever be denied in the United States, then will we indeed echo the words of Sir Edward Grey and with him sadly say:

One by one the lights of civilization are being extinguished.

But this, Mr. President, must not be. Somewhere in the world the lights of civilization must continue to burn. Somewhere in the world the right of men to be free must be preserved. Somewhere in the world there must be people willing to declare over and over and again with Abraham Lincoln, "Government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

This country, which gave birth to the ideals of free government, is the country where those rights must be preserved and maintained. It is the lot of this country to keep the lights of civilization from being extinguished. It is ours, Mr. President, to maintain and preserve the rights of men to be free. It is ours to hold fast to the principle that men can govern themselves.

As the ultimate repository of the rights and liberties of the people of America, the Supreme Court of the United States has the great responsibility of safeguarding democracy itself. In the years of its existence the Court, with few lapses, has done that very thing. The lights of liberty in America have been kept burning. Men have been free in the United States. Free institutions survive in America today. That men may be free tomorrow and throughout the years to come, let not justice be denied. As the Court speaks the voice of the people as expressed in the Constitution, wisdom, truth, and righteousness shall permeate its decisions. Let those decisions and opinions today speak the commendation of the Court. Let its decrees write its history. Let its judgment for others be judgment upon itself. Truly the Supreme Court is the keeper of the lights of freedom, perhaps of civilization. May those lights never be dimmed. May their bright and shining effulgence ever reflect the greatness and the glory of the Supreme Court and the greatness and glory of the United States of America.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, the Supreme Court is a unique instrument of popular sovereignty. Without power to enforce its judgments, uncrowned, unseparated, devoid of sword, or purse, or patronage, the Supreme Court of the United States for 150 years has successfully guarded the institutions which expel autocracy and animate free government.

The authority of this highest tribunal of justice consists of the moral energy springing from popular belief and confidence in, and respect for, the purity, wisdom, and independence of the Court.

The limitation upon its function, confining its judicial opinions to cases of injury litigated in due judicial course between parties having a legal interest therein, has maintained that separation of it from the executive and legislative branches of government which has been an effective barrier against concentration of sovereignty. Its judicial power cannot be extended by itself. When properly summoned it is the duty of the Court, from which it may not shrink, to exercise this power. In cases and controversies in which legal judgment can be rendered, it must declare the law. However, that declaration, to endure, must be right. Herein rests the safety of popular government.

No departure from this limitation can be suffered. Advisory opinions may not be required of the Court by either Congress or Executive. Moot cases may not be heard and decided by the Court.

The wholesome restriction, by the Constitution, of original jurisdiction to but a few cases, has not only proved to be peculiarly beneficial to a Federal system dependent upon maintenance of local State sovereignties, but it has given vigor to the principle of responsibility direct to the people.

The Supreme Court derives whatever exclusive jurisdiction it possesses, and all of its judicial power, from the people by a direct grant. It does not receive such power from Congress, as other Federal courts do. This jurisdiction cannot be enlarged nor can it be taken away save by the people themselves. This unique characteristic of the Court protects States and citizens from the Central Government and conserves for the people the prerogative of change. Appellate jurisdiction alone is subject to regulation by Congress.

The supremacy of our fundamental law—the known covenant of our rights—is peculiarly the charge of the Court. All citizens, and all officers, high and low, are bound to support the Constitution; yet this is inadequate to perpetuate our free institutions. This we know by the tragic experience of our forefathers without fixed laws to live by.

The people's law, made by themselves, for themselves and their posterity, was fixed in the Constitution. It can be changed only by the people. It cannot be changed by government. It is intended to govern government. It protects the citizen from government. Those two fortresses of their liberty—State sovereignty and decentralization of Federal rule—depend upon its sanctity. Therefore, the people established an institution with the novel power of giving stability and vitality to the people's law. The Supreme Court is particularly the people's court.

Though not expressly described in the Constitution, the right to declare statutes void for conflict with the fundamental law is clear by necessary implication and inevitable practice. This has been the rod by which the people have disciplined their government. The certainty of its use, notwithstanding the roaring of the transgressors, has punctuated the history of our remarkable progress economically, politically, and socially. Its use has been the marvel and admiration of statesmen, jurists, and historians of other countries.

It has preserved our form of government. For a century and a half it has enabled a logical development of the American system.

It has prevented a gap occurring between the limits of the powers of the Republic and those of the several States, and likewise it has prevented the overlapping of those powers. It has defined the frontiers and boundaries of jurisdiction.

When the national sovereignty was at low ebb, the Court, under Marshall, turned the tide.

When the backwash of the War between the States threatened to engulf the South, the Court, under Salmon P. Chase and other northern judges, erected a dyke against the reaction.

More recently, when the Federal Government encroached on local self-government, the Court, under Hughes, threw up the barricade of judicial protection.

The Supreme Court does not determine or change policy. Its action is but a brake on speed. In due time, change of the fundamental law can be made in conformity to the well-settled public opinion and the prescribed methods.

Its power is simply the authority to dispose of a controversy before the Court in which one citizen who is a party to a case claims rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution. It is not the absolute negating or revision of law. This was refused by the Constitutional Convention.

If public opinion should desire centralization of a power in Washington and diminution of local self-government, the negation by the Court of Congressional acts can be surmounted by amendments.

However, I believe in the principle so precisely stated by Calvin Coolidge:

No method of procedure has ever been devised by which liberty could be divorced from local self-government. No plan of centralization has ever been adopted which did not result in bureaucracy, tyranny, inflexibility, reaction, and decline. * * *

The record of the Supreme Court has been great and good. The perpetuity of our free institutions will be secure just so long as the people freely give obedience and respect to the judgments of the Court.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order previously entered, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of unobjected-to measures on the calendar, beginning with Order of Business No. 1197, which the clerk will state.

CESSION OF LANDS TO TEXAS

The bill (H. R. 6124) giving consent of Congress to the addition of lands to the State of Texas and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain parcels or tracts of land heretofore acquired by the United States of America from the United Mexican States, was announced as first in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the able leader on the Democratic side, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], desires to be present at this time, as do other Senators, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	George	Lee	Schwartz
Andrews	Gerry	Lucas	Schwellenbach
Ashurst	Gibson	Lundeen	Shipstead
Austin	Gillette	McCarran	S'attery
Barbour	Glass	McKellar	Smathers
Barkley	Green	McNary	Smith
Bridges	Guffey	Maloney	Stewart
Brown	Gurney	Mead	Taft
Bulow	Hale	Miller	Thomas, Okla.
Byrnes	Harrison	Minton	Tobey
Capper	Hatch	Murray	Townsend
Caraway	Hayden	Norris	Truman
Chandler	Herring	Nye	Tydings
Chavez	Hill	O'Mahoney	Vandenberg
Clark, Idaho	Holman	Overton	Van Nuys

Donahey	Johnson, Calif.	Radcliffe	Wheeler
Downey	Johnson, Colo.	Reed	White
Ellender	King	Reynolds	Wiley
Frazier	La Follette	Russell

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the third reading of House bill 6124.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3035) authorizing certain appointments to the United States Military Academy to fill cadetships heretofore created, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over! Over!

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I did not want to oppose the bill, or ask that it go over, but I did desire to have an explanation of it if it was to be acted upon.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will not the Senator who objected withhold his objection?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I was one of the Senators who objected to the consideration of the bill, and I shall be glad to withhold my objection.

Mr. KING. Three or four Senators have objected to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being heard, the bill will be passed over.

FOREST LAND IN LINCOLN COUNTY, OREG.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 194) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make a study of a tract of forest land situated in Lincoln County, State of Oregon, which had been reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause, and to insert the following:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make or cause to be made a study of the tract of 12,731 acres of forest land situated in Lincoln County, State of Oregon, owned or controlled by the United States Spruce Production Corporation, and described in the contract between that corporation and the Pacific Spruce Corporation dated December 17, 1920, under which the commercial timber on said tract was sold to said Pacific Spruce Corporation, and to submit to the President of the Senate a report of his findings on the following two points:

1. The volume of timber of commercial species, quality, and character which by the said contract or agreement of December 17, 1920, and by statements, prospectuses, advertisements, cruises, or other declarations issued by the United States Spruce Production Corporation prior to said date was asserted to exist upon said lands and to be subject to purchase and removal.

2. The volume of timber of commercial species, quality, and character which on December 17, 1920, actually existed on said lands, so far as that can now be determined by (a) adequate cruises of the part thereof still uncut and standing on said lands, (b) reviews and analyses of all obtainable scale books, milling, shipping, and other records of the volumes of timber actually cut and removed from said lands by the Pacific Spruce Corporation or its successor, the C. D. Johnson Lumber Co., and (c) determinations on the ground of the commercial timber which was cut but not removed or was otherwise wasted or utilized.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I have a right to do, I wish to modify the joint resolution so as to make it a simple Senate resolution. I move, therefore, to strike out the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof "Resolved," and that the resolution be given its appropriate number.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think it is fair to state that this resolution does not involve an appropriation; it merely asks the Secretary of Agriculture to make a study through the Forest Service to determine the amount of timber on a certain tract of land, which land is now somewhat involved in a dispute. I have offered the resolution at the request of those concerned in arriving at a definite and accurate conclusion, and request its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 225) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to make or cause to be made a study of the tract of 12,731 acres of forest land situated in Lincoln County, State of Oregon, owned or controlled by the United States Spruce Production Corporation, and described in the contract between that corporation and the Pacific Spruce Corporation, dated December 17, 1920, under which the commercial timber on said tract was sold to said Pacific Spruce Corporation, and to submit to the President of the Senate a report of his findings on the following two points:

1. The volume of timber of commercial species, quality, and character which by the said contract or agreement of December 17, 1920, and by statements, prospectuses, advertisements, cruises, or other declarations issued by the United States Spruce Production Corporation prior to said date was asserted to exist upon said lands and to be subject to purchase and removal.

2. The volume of timber of commercial species, quality, and character which on December 17, 1920, actually existed on said lands, so far as that can now be determined by (a) adequate cruises of the part thereof still uncut and standing on said lands, (b) reviews and analyses of all obtainable scale books, milling, shipping, and other records of the volumes of timber actually cut and removed from said lands by the Pacific Spruce Corporation or its successor, the C. D. Johnson Lumber Co., and (c) determinations on the ground of the commercial timber which was cut but not removed or was otherwise wasted or utilized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 194) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make a study of a tract of forest land situated in Lincoln County, State of Oregon, will be indefinitely postponed.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO MAKE COMMISSIONERS LOANS

The bill (H. R. 7342) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is a House bill which extends until 1942 the authority of the land banks to make commissioners loans. That authority expires today, and unless the bill is passed the land banks cannot continue to make commissioners loans as they have up to now, and it is very important that the bill be enacted.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether there is any change in the regulations or the provisions of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no change at all. The only change in the legislation is that the bill extends the date from February 1, 1940, to June 1, 1942. That is all there is to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 7342) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Vice President be authorized to sign this bill notwithstanding the Senate may be in recess or adjournment, because in order that it may become effective without any hiatus, the President must sign it today. I should like to have consent that the Vice President may sign the measure during the adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BERYL M. M'HAM

The bill (S. 2346) for the relief of Beryl M. McHam, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I merely invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that a measure similar to this has been passed once, possibly more than once, and the President vetoed it. Furthermore, it is strongly opposed by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2346) for the relief of Beryl M. McHam was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Beryl M. McHam, who served in Company C, Twenty-sixth Regiment, and Company C, Eighth Regiment, United States Infantry, World War, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the 7th day of July 1920: Provided, That no pay, compensation, benefit, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

INVESTIGATION OF PHOSPHATE RESOURCES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 199) amending Public Resolution No. 112 of the Seventy-fifth Congress and Public Resolution No. 48 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, what is the purpose of the joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the life of the committee provided for by Public Resolution No. 112 of the Seventy-fifth Congress creating a Joint Congressional Committee to Investigate the Adequacy and Use of the Phosphate Resources of the United States, and Public Resolution No. 48 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, and the time for making its final report is extended to January 15, 1941.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT-ELECT IN 1941

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32) authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to make arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States in 1941, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three Senators and three Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, is authorized to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States on the 20th day of January 1941.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS, 1940

The bill (H. R. 8067) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, that is the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I suggest that it be considered at the conclusion of the call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be passed over until the conclusion of the call of the calendar.

COMPENSATION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES, PANAMA CANAL ZONE

The bill (S. 3130) relating to the citizenship and compensation of certain employees on military construction work in the Panama Canal Zone was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every contract entered into by the Quartermaster Corps of the Army for construction and installation of buildings, flying fields, and appurtenances thereto in the Panama Canal Zone, pursuant to the provisions of the act of June 11, 1938 (Public, No. 590, 75th Cong.), the act of April 26, 1939 (Public, No. 44, 76th Cong.), the act of July 1, 1939 (Public, No. 164, 76th Cong.), and the act of August 9, 1939 (Public, No. 361, 76th Cong.), shall provide (a) that all personnel employed in such work and occupying skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, and supervisory positions shall be citizens of the United States; and (b) that the compensation of such persons shall not be lower than the compensation paid for the same or similar services to employees of the Panama Canal, as shall be predetermined by the Secretary of War.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago Senate bill 3130 was passed. My attention was distracted from the proceedings for a moment, so I lost my opportunity to offer an amendment.

I offer an amendment to that measure at the request of my former colleague, Senator Gore. I do not ask that the amendment be considered now. I make the request that the vote by which Senate bill 3130 was passed be reconsidered, so that I may offer the amendment and have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which Senate bill 3130 was passed is reconsidered.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I offer the amendment in question and ask that it be printed and lie on the table, and then at a later date those interested in this particular measure can have a chance to consider the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to the bill (S. 3130) relating to the citizenship and compensation of certain employees on military construction work in the Panama Canal Zone, viz:

On page 2, line 7, change the period to a colon and add the following: "Provided, That during the calendar year 1940 only such manufactured articles, materials, and supplies as have been manufactured in the United States substantially all from articles, materials, or supplies mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States shall be contracted for or acquired for such use. This proviso shall not apply if articles, materials, or supplies of the class or kind to be used or the articles, materials, or supplies from which they are manufactured are not mined, produced, or manufactured, as the case may be, in the United States in sufficient and reasonably available commercial quantities and of a satisfactory quality."

MATTIE N. COLE

The resolution (S. Res. 221) to pay a gratuity to Mattie N. Cole was considered and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Mattie N. Cole, widow of William N. Cole, late an employee of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PAY OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 71) relating to pay to certain employees of the Government Printing Office for uncompensated leave earned during the fiscal year 1932, which had been reported from the Committee on Printing with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in addition to any other leave of absence to which an officer or employee of the Government Printing Office may be entitled, leave of absence earned during the fiscal year 1932 which has not been taken by such officer or employee or for which he has not otherwise been compensated shall be granted (with pay at the rate to which such officer or employee was entitled at the time such leave was earned) by the Public Printer during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, under such rules or regulations as he shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROVISION FOR TITLE OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL IN DEPARTMENTS OF PANAMA AND HAWAII

The bill (S. 3200) to provide for the rank and title of lieutenant general of the Regular Army in the military departments of Panama and Hawaii was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. MINTON. I can say to the Senator from Utah generally, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee, that in the Department of Panama and the Department of Hawaii the commanding officers do not have the rank and title of lieutenant general as do the commanding officers in the corps areas in continental United States. The measure is simply designed to equalize the ranks of the various commanding generals.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide for the rank and title of lieutenant general of the Regular Army," approved August 5, 1939, is hereby amended to include the major generals of the Regular Army specifically assigned by the Secretary of War to command the Panama Canal and Hawaiian Departments.

EXCHANGE OF LANDS WITH RICHMOND FREDERICKSBURG & POTOMAC RAILROAD CO.

The bill (S. 2992) to authorize an exchange of lands between the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co. and the United States, at Quantico, Va., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co., a corporation of the State of Virginia, by appropriate deed of conveyance, free from all encumbrances and without cost to the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co. all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the following parcels of land contained within the Marine Corps Reservation at Quantico, Va., as indicated by metes and bounds descriptions on blueprint "P. W. Drawing No. 665, approved August 19, 1938," and "Right of Way and Track Map of Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co. V-1/40," both on file in the Navy Department:

Parcel 1. Strip of land approximately ten feet wide and nine hundred feet long adjacent to and along the east side of the right-of-way of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co., containing two thousand and sixty-six ten-thousandths of an acre, more or less; and Parcel 4. A strip of land twenty feet wide and twelve hundred feet long adjacent to and along the east side of the right-of-way of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co., containing five thousand and five hundred and nine ten-thousandths of an acre, more or less; in consideration of the transfer to the United States by appropriate deed of conveyance by the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co., free from all encumbrances, and without cost to the United States, all right, title, and interest of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co., to the following parcels of land:

Parcel 2. A strip of land along the west boundary of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co. right-of-way between the center line of the old channel of Chopawamsic Creek and the 1877 channel change, containing five and three one-hundredths acres, more or less; and Parcel 3. A strip of land between the west boundary of the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co. and the 1877 channel of Chopawamsic Creek, containing nine and forty-eight one-hundredths acres, more or less.

Sec. 2. The Secretary of the Navy is further authorized to acquire on behalf of the United States by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, all right, title, and interest in any remaining small areas adjoining parcels 2 and 3 and the 1877 channel change of Chopawamsic Creek in order to adjust the boundary line of the Marine Corps Reservation.

Sec. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

PAYMENT OF COMMUTED RATIONS OF ENLISTED MEN

The bill (S. 3012) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. 662), relative to the payment of the commuted rations of enlisted men, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. 662), insofar as the provisions thereof are embodied in section 908 of title 34 of the United States Code, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Money accruing from the commuted rations of enlisted men legally assigned to duty with officers' or other messes, afloat or ashore, may be paid under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy."

REIMBURSEMENT FOR FIRE DAMAGES AT MARINE BARRACKS, QUANTICO, VA.

The bill (S. 3068) to provide an additional sum for the payment of a claim under the act entitled "An act to provide for the reimbursement of certain personnel or former personnel of the United States Navy and United States Marine Corps for the value of personal effects destroyed as a result of a fire at the Marine Barracks, Quantico, Va., on October 27, 1938," approved June 19, 1939, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum not to exceed $129.75, as may be required by the Secretary of the Navy to reimburse Private (First Class) Earl S. Rogers, United States Marine Corps, after claimant shall have filed itemized statement showing actual damages sustained by proper appraisal, and under such regulations as he may prescribe pursuant to the provisions of Private Act No. 56, Seventy-sixth Congress, approved June 19, 1939, for losses of and damages to reasonable and necessary personal property resulting from the fire which occurred at the Marine Barracks, Quantico, Va., on October 27, 1938: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

LAND AT FLOYD BENNETT FIELD

The bill (S. 3174) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept, without cost to the United States, a fee-simple conveyance of 16.4 acres, more or less, of land at Floyd Bennett Field in the city and State of New York was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the purpose of the bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept from the city of New York, without cost to the United States Government, a parcel of land containing about 16.4 acres at Floyd Bennett Field in the city of New York for use as a naval seaplane base, its more immediate need being in connection with the neutrality patrol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to accept on behalf of the United States of America, from the city of New York, free of all encumbrances, and without cost to the United States Government, a tract of land containing 16.4 acres, more or less, at Floyd Bennett Field in the city and State of New York, for use as a naval seaplane base: Provided, That the title to said land shall be satisfactory to the Attorney General and that the conveyance of said land shall be made to the United States of America and shall include the right of access for wheeled vehicles to the land conveyed from the highway bordering the said Floyd Bennett Field property on the westward, known as Flatbush Avenue; also the right of access over adjoining lands of Floyd Bennett Field for the purpose of transporting dredge material to be taken from the submerged or tidal lands adjacent to lands of Floyd Bennett Field for filling the land to be conveyed to a grade conforming to present grades of the Coast Guard reservation and the said Floyd Bennett Field, and also the right to lay, construct, and maintain through the Floyd Bennett Field property water lines, electric lines, telephone lines, gas lines, and other services as the Navy Department may find necessary for its proper and convenient use of the property acquired pursuant to the provisions hereof.

SIDNEY M. BOWEN

The bill (H. R. 5634) granting 6 months' pay to Sidney M. Bowen was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HONORABLE DISCHARGE OF MINORS FROM NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The bill (H. R. 5734) for the relief of World War sailors and marines who were discharged from the United States Navy or United States Marine Corps because of minority or misrepresentation of age was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. May we have an explanation of that bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the bill seeks to make the naval law conform with the military law. The act of January 19, 1929, provides that enlisted men who enlisted in the naval service under similar circumstances between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, shall, if otherwise entitled to it, be considered to have been honorably discharged.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much will the measure cost?

Mr. WALSH. There will be no cost. Under the law as originally enacted, a youth under age, who was found to have enlisted during the period of war, was dishonorably discharged. By an act of the Congress that provision for dishonorable discharge has been removed, and such a youth is assumed to be honorably discharged. So under existing law, any youth enlisting in the Army or the Navy between the breaking out of the war on April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, who was under age, is now assumed to be honorably discharged.

The present law does not apply to a youth who fought during the war, but who enlisted prior to the breaking out of the war. The law applying to those who enlisted in the Army provides that those enlisting under 18 years of age prior to the breaking out of the war, though that fact was discovered after the war, need not be dishonorably discharged because of their age. Under existing law they are now held to be honorably discharged.

The pending bill puts the enlisted men of the Navy in the same position with the enlisted men of the Army, so that any youth who, before the outbreak of the war, as well as during the war, and up to the time of the end of the war, was under 18 years of age, who was so zealous and enthusiastic that he wanted to fight for his country before he reached the age of 18, shall be considered to be honorably discharged, provided there has been no subsequent misconduct.

Mr. KING. I was going to ask a question as to the latter consideration.

Mr. WALSH. There is a provision that it must appear that there was no subsequent misconduct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7922) making appropriations for the executive office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ADAMS. This measure is the independent offices appropriation bill, 1941. I understand it is agreed that the measure is not to be considered today. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

That concludes the calendar, with the exception of the urgent deficiency appropriations bill, which was temporarily passed over.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1205, House bill 8067, making appropriations to supply urgency deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8067) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Legislative," on page 1, after line 7, to insert:

SENATE

For payment to Mary Borah, widow of William E. Borah, late a Senator from the State of Idaho, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 2, to insert:

For repairs, improvements, equipment, and supplies for Senate kitchens and restaurants, Capitol Building and Senate Office Building, including personal and other services, to be expended from the contingent fund of the Senate, under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, fiscal year 1940, $23,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 15, to insert:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL

Senate Office Building: To reimburse the maintenance fund of the Senate Office Building for the fiscal year 1940 for necessary emergency expenditures for desks, chairs, stands, tables, and other equipment and supplies, for the use of the additional clerical assistants to Senators, under the provisions of Public Law No. 216, Seventy-sixth Congress, approved July 25, 1939, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 4, to strike out:

EXECUTIVE

INDEPENDENT ESTABLISHMENTS

UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The portion of the appropriation for the Commission, contained in the Third Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1939, which may be expended exclusively for personal services is hereby increased from $5,000 to $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Navy Department—Replacement of naval vessels", on page 4, line 16, after the numerals "1940", to strike out "$29,000,000" and insert "$28,000,000", so as to read:

Armor, armament, and ammunition: For an additional amount toward the armor, armament, and ammunition for vessels heretofore authorized (and appropriated for in part), including the same objects and under the same conditions and limitations prescribed under this head in the Naval Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1940, $28,000,000, to continue available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a convention, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. ASHURST (for Mr. NEELY), from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Albert M. Rowe, of West Virginia, to be United States marshal for the northern district of West Virginia.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Lewis Compton, of New Jersey, to be The Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for appointment and promotion in the Navy.

Mr. MINTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for appointment, by transfer, in the Regular Army, and also the nominations of several officers for appointment as general officers in the National Guard.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the Calendar.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Benjamin Marvin Casteel to be work-projects administrator for Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of William J. Barker to be judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination of William J. Barker to be judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida. I make this request because I understand that the President is leaving for Hyde Park this afternoon, not to return until probably Tuesday; and the regular term of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida begins next Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on account of the noise in the Chamber I did not hear the nature of the Senator's request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asked that the President be notified of the confirmation of the appointment of a judge in the southern district of Florida.

Mr. McNARY. Is the name of the nominee on the Calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is, and the nomination has been confirmed.

The clerk will state the next nomination.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John Patrick Hartigan to be judge of the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Theron Lamar Caudle to be United States attorney for the western district of North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Julius J. Wichser to be United States Marshal for the southern district of Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Edwin D. Bolger to be United States marshal for the western district of Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of David J. Lewis to be a member of the National Mediation Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

GOVERNOR OF ALASKA

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Ernest Gruening to be Governor of the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, under the prevailing practice of "carpetbagging" the Governorship of Alaska, I have no objection to Mr. Gruening as a nominee. I merely wish to assert my belief that the residents of Alaska are highly justified in insisting that there is now a sufficient civilized population in Alaska so that it ought to be permitted to have one of its own residents selected as Governor. I hope this is the last "external" Governor who will be sent in that capacity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Melvin C. Hazen to be Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BYRNES. I ask that the nomination go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, previously today I submitted a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs recommending the confirmation of various nominations for promotions in the Navy. I also submitted a report recommending the confirmation of the nomination of The Assistant Secretary of the Navy. I do not ask that the latter nomination be taken up now. I suggest that it remain on the calendar. However, with respect to the list of naval officers who are recommended for promotion, I ask that those nominations be now confirmed, only for the reason that such action will save a great amount of reprinting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The promotions referred to are matters of a perfunctory nature.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? None is heard, and the nominations for promotions in the Navy are confirmed.

INSURANCE STUDY BY TEMPORARY NATIONAL ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think it is usually the case, when a committee of Congress undertakes an investigation or study of any kind, that persons who are called before the committee are sometimes inclined to feel a little apprehensive as to the purposes of the committee, and also as to the method the committee may follow.

This has been the case with respect to the study of the Temporary National Economic Committee. Certain misapprehensions of the work and purposes of the committee have been current during the past 3 or 4 months, particularly with respect to the study of insurance which has been in progress. Articles have been published attributing to the committee purposes and motives which the committee itself has never entertained. Upon numerous occasions the chairman of the committee has been at great pains to iterate and reiterate that the only object of the committee is to gather substantive facts regarding the economic situation and to present them in such a form that they may be studied not only by the committee but by the public also.

During the past month or so several Members of Congress have received letters from persons engaged in the insurance business giving expression to some of the fears to which I have alluded. On January 22 I wrote a letter to Representative TAYLOR of Colorado, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, to whom one of these letters had been addressed. In my communication to him I undertook to explain in detail the purpose of the committee and attempted to set at rest some of the mistaken notions as to what the committee is trying to do.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter which I have written to Representative TAYLOR, together with the accompanying documents, be printed in the RECORD. I do this in order that a correct statement may be available to all Members of Congress to whom such inquiries have been addressed.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Last fall the insurance commissioner of my State and a number of insurance agents came to see me about the rumor to which the Senator has referred. I should like to know whether or not, in the letter addressed to the Representative from Colorado, the Senator from Wyoming made any statement as to whether or not the committee intends to recommend to the Congress at this session that legislation be enacted providing for Federal supervision of insurance, or for some agency of the Government going into the insurance business. Such was the statement that had been communicated to the insurance officials of my State and to persons engaged in the insurance business. If the committee has no such plan at this time, I think publicity should be given to the statement of the Senator from Wyoming, so that the insurance people will not be unduly alarmed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I can say without reservation or qualification of any kind that the committee has never met to consider recommendations with respect to insurance; and no member of the committee has ever suggested to the chairman that either of the policies which the Senator has just mentioned should be adopted, or that any recommendation of that character should be made.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Is the statement made by the Senator in accord with the statement communicated to him by Representative TAYLOR, of Colorado, to whom the Senator's letter was addressed?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. Has the Senator any idea as to the origin of the statement which caused persons throughout the country to obtain the impression referred to?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. BYRNES. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The statement originated from two principal sources. In the first place, there appeared in a recent issue of the Nation's Business, which is published by the United States Chamber of Commerce, an extensive article on insurance, and in this article certain purposes were attributed to the committee. Among those were not only those which the Senator has mentioned, but also the purpose of destroying the agency system of selling insurance. That is also a complete and utter misapprehension.

As a matter of fact, I have never heard any member of the committee indicate anything but the greatest sympathy for the agency system. Speaking for myself, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that my deepest conviction is that the solution of the Nation's economic troubles does not lie along the road of the expansion of Government activity or competition by Government with private industry. My conviction is that the best service we can render to the people of the United States is to stimulate free private enterprise. So it would be far from the chairman's thought to give support to any such proposal; and I am confident that no such proposal could receive an affirmative vote in the committee, if, indeed, it should be suggested.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that the only statement made by the committee with respect to its activities was the preliminary report, which dealt largely with patents? As I understand, that is the only authorized expression by the committee of any of its opinions or conclusions reached during the hearings.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Absolutely. Not only is that true, but I will say that I have questioned members of the committee with respect to certain published conclusions which were attributed to them, and as yet I have been unable to find any member of the committee who would assume for himself the responsibility for making any such suggestions.

I will say to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], with respect to his inquiry regarding Federal supervision of life insurance, or insurance of any kind, that it is an amusing fact that strong arguments have been made by insurance companies to support Federal jurisdiction over the business. In the article which appears in the Nation's Business, two cases were cited—the case of Paul against Virginia and the case of New York Life Insurance Co. against Deer Lodge, Mont.—with both of which Senators are familiar. These cases were cited to support the conclusion that insurance is not commerce within the commerce clause of the Constitution, and therefore should not be subjected to any kind of Federal supervision. The curious fact is that both of those cases were brought by insurance companies, which entered the courts for the purpose of trying to prove that insurance is a national business and should not be regulated by the States.

In the case of Paul against Virginia, the State of Virginia had enacted a statute providing that no foreign insurance company should be permitted to sell life insurance in that State without first having obtained a license from the State. One of the requirements for securing such a license was the deposit of a certain amount of bonds with State authorities. The insurance company instructed its agent, a man by the name of Paul, to make application for a license but to refuse to file the bonds so that he might be arrested and prosecuted in order that a test case should go to the United States Supreme Court. The issue there was whether or not there should be State regulation of insurance, and this particular company was seeking legal authority to resist that sort of regulation.

The same was true in the Deer Lodge case. There the New York Life Insurance Co. was at great pains to prove that the business of insurance was so national in scope, so interstate in character, that it should be relieved of State taxation.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The statement of the Senator is that not only has the committee not agreed upon any such recommendation but the chairman of the committee does not know of any member of the committee who is urging or advocating either of the two proposals to which I have referred?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly not. No such proposal has been made or urged upon the committee.

Mr. BYRNES. It seems to me that it is only one of many cases where somebody has deliberately attempted to tear down the work of the committee by arousing sentiment against it throughout the country. My hope is that in some way the statement of the Senator may be carried to the country. I do not say it is so in this instance, but sometimes such things are prompted by the desire of somebody to frighten businessmen into employing representatives to save them from the "terrible" Congress. Whether that is the case or whether there is a sincere fear underlying suggestions which have been made is something we cannot pass upon, but I am accepting without any question at all the statement of the Senator from Wyoming, and it demonstrates that many able businessmen throughout the country have been imposed upon.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, I cannot pretend to forecast what recommendation the committee may eventually desire to make, but I can express my own well-founded opinion, and I do assert in the most emphatic way that somebody has been erecting a straw man for the purpose of knocking him down and at the same time perhaps of casting some impediments in the way of the committee.

May I be permitted here at this point to say that when the committee was created it was widely prophesied that the purpose of the committee was to embark upon a witch hunt? Many of the columnists who send out their interesting reports from Washington made the prediction, "This is going to be a witch hunt; an effort will be made to pillory business; an effort will be made to victimize the leaders of business." This committee has been in existence now for considerably more than a year, and it certainly ought to be significant to business leaders and to the public generally throughout the country that nobody has yet been hanged by the committee.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that this discussion has taken more time than I thought it would at the beginning, I shall modify my request and now ask that the letter and documents to which I referred be printed in the body of the RECORD in connection with the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter and documents referred to are as follows:

INSURANCE INDUSTRY NOT UNDER ATTACK

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1940.

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TAYLOR: Mr. James R. Brackett, executive secretary of the Temporary National Economic Committee, has handed me your letter of January 15 with enclosures from two of your constituents commenting upon the study of insurance which has been presented to this committee by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Since both of these letters give expression to certain misapprehensions which are now current with respect to this study, I shall venture to discuss the matter in more detail than might otherwise seem necessary. I shall also take the liberty of making the letter public.

In the first place, let me say that as long ago as November 14, 1939, in response to an inquiry from Hon. George E. Allen, Commissioner of the District of Columbia, who had an engagement to speak to the Massachusetts Insurance Society the following week, I wrote him a letter with respect to these reports. In that letter I said:

"I am most happy to authorize you to say on my behalf that there isn't the slightest basis for the intimations appearing in certain insurance journals that the committee, or any member of its staff, is promoting any scheme for Government competition with the insurance industry * * *."

"As has been indicated by the message of President Roosevelt in which he recommended this economic study and by frequent statements of the chairman, statements which have never been controverted by any member of the committee or its staff, the sole objective of the committee is to promote free, private enterprise. Statements to the contrary are wholly unwarranted."

These statements are as correct today as when I wrote them. Moreover, before my letter to Mr. Allen was placed in his hands I submitted it to Commissioner Leon Henderson of the Securities and Exchange Commission and to Mr. Gerhard A. Gesell, special counsel for the Securities and Exchange Commission, who has presented the insurance study to our committee. Neither of these gentlemen offered any objection to the letter so that it may be taken not only as the expression of the chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee, but also as the expression of those members of the committee and of its staff who are associated with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

If you will examine again the letters which you have received, you will find that like others which have been sent to other Members of Congress they rely not upon anything that has been recommended by this committee but solely upon the predictions, assumptions, suspicions, and fears of the writers as to what the committee may do. No one knows better than you how perfectly impossible it is to disprove the accuracy of a prophecy, yet practically all of the allegations which are now being circulated among Members of Congress are based upon predictions of what the committee intends to do. I can only say to you that I have no reason whatever to place any credence in these direful predictions.

Upon investigation I find that the letters now coming to Members of Congress from persons engaged in the insurance industry and from a few State commissioners appear to have been based upon a memorandum recently distributed to the industry by Col. C. B. Robbins, manager and general counsel of the American Life Convention with offices in Chicago. Colonel Robbins was good enough to place a copy of this memorandum in my hands last Saturday. I have since read it and find in it and in the special bulletin and form letter which accompanied it at least several statements which are not substantiated by any facts which have come to my knowledge. Let me list some of them:

1. The covering letter transmitting the American Life Convention pamphlet explains its circulation with the statement:

"It was thought advisable to warn them (Members of Congress) of the desire of some members of the Temporary National Economic Committee for Federal supervision of all life insurance, together with the taking over by the Government of industrial insurance and merging it with the social-security system."

2. The letter implies that it is the purpose of the committee, or some of its members, to abolish the agency system of selling life insurance.

3. These inferences are carried throughout the pamphlet with certain additional inaccuracies as, for example, the following prophecy which, so far as I can find out, is altogether without foundation:

"Any proposal for Federal supervision and control would not emanate from policyholders—its source would be purely political—and should one of the principal purposes behind it be to secure indirect but effective dominion over the $30,000,000,000 held in trust by the companies, its accomplishment would be a calamity."

4. The pamphlet sets forth that the insurance business "has been subjected to an injurious and unfair attack" and that "no opportunities have been given for companies to reply to insinuations in questions as to their practices, nor have the witnesses been permitted to make full statements while answering trick questions propounded to them by the counsel."

There are other inaccuracies which could be noted, as, for example, the statement in the covering letter that the Securities and Exchange Commission has 64 investigators at work among the companies while, as a matter of fact, the Securities and Exchange Commission advises me that at the present time it has only 8 investigators in the field and has never had more than 12. Let me, however, deal with these important statements which I have listed:

1. No member of the committee, or of its staff, has ever intimated to me that the Government should take over industrial insurance, nor has any suggestion ever been made to me by any person associated with this committee that industrial insurance should be merged with the social-security system. Moreover, the committee has never discussed any such proposal at any meeting and it has never made any recommendation at all.

It is true that Senator WAGNER, of New York, has been quoted in the newspapers as favoring a Federal annuity system under the Social Security Board. It should be noted that Senator WAGNER is not a member of this committee and therefore his views cannot be imputed to the committee. Moreover, his proposal has never been discussed by the committee.

2. With respect to the allegation that this committee wants to undermine the agency system, I am glad to be able to assure you that there is not the slightest foundation for any such report. I know of no member of the committee or of the staff who has even intimated such a proposal.

3. The suggestion that one of the principal purposes behind the study is to enable the Federal Government to secure domination of insurance-company reserves is utterly fantastic. Even if such a proposal were suggested, and no such suggestion has been made, I do not hesitate in expressing my opinion that this committee would never for one moment consider submitting any report or any recommendation which would in the slightest degree lend color to this assertion.

4. With respect to the charge that witnesses have been compelled to answer trick questions and that no opportunity has been given to the companies to reply to insinuations, let me say that in the insurance hearings, as in every other hearing, every witness was given full opportunity to be accompanied by his lawyer on the stand. In most cases the witnesses knew in advance the type of question that was to be submitted and the general tenor of the examination. From the very outset the committee has taken every precaution to give the fullest opportunity to every witness and to every company. It may be worth while noting that only last week, at the conclusion of the study of cartels, two very distinguished business executives, Mr. Cornelius F. Kelley, head of the Anaconda Copper Co., and Mr. E. T. Stannard, president of the Kennecott Copper Co., both publicly commented at the hearings upon the fairness with which the committee had acted and the fairness of the hearing itself.

Let me assure you that we have not been conscious of any purpose or desire to be otherwise with the representatives of the insurance industry. Several months ago this committee issued a public invitation to industry to make presentation to the committee of its own views in its own way. This invitation was accepted by the oil industry and by the steel industry. I think an examination of the record in the former case will support the statement that a more complete and authoritative study of the oil industry has never been made. I trust that the same may be true of the steel industry, the hearings upon which are still in progress.

This invitation has been open to the insurance industry. It is still open and at the next executive meeting of the committee it will be my purpose to propose that a special invitation be extended to the insurance industry to present to this committee its own story in its own way. In order that you may know the manner in which such hearings are conducted, I am attaching a copy of the procedure which the committee has laid down for such an industrial presentation.

It is just as true now as it was in the beginning of these hearings that the only purpose of the committee has been to make an objective study of our economic system. You may, with perfect confidence, thus assure all persons who make inquiry of you.

I venture to add here the opinion which I have expressed upon many occasions, that economic freedom is just as essential to the happiness and prosperity of our people as religious and political liberty, that the extreme need of our time is the elimination of all restraints upon economic opportunity, and that business itself needs the liberation of the natural person from regimentation from economic forces as well as his protection from regimentation by government. Both business and government are intended to serve people. My interest in the work of the Temporary National Economic Committee and, so far as I have been able to observe, the interest of every member of the committee has been to preserve this economic freedom.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY.

LIFE INSURANCE SHOULD BE SUPERVISED, REGULATED, AND GOVERNED BY LAW IN THE STATES

Enclosed herewith is a copy of the pamphlet just issued by the convention, prepared by a committee composed of Messrs. C. A. Craig, T. A. Phillips, and Claris Adams, working in conjunction with convention headquarters.

The pamphlet has been examined, edited, and approved by the executive committee of the convention. It is being sent to all vice presidents of the convention, together with a letter, a copy of which is enclosed with this bulletin, and which is self-explanatory.

Should you desire more copies of this pamphlet, kindly notify convention headquarters, and we will mail them to you for use by your officers and agents in the manner in which you think will be most useful.

C. B. ROBBINS,

Manager and General Counsel.

[Copy of form letter referred to in par. 7 of Senator O'MAHONEY'S letter]

AMERICAN LIFE CONVENTION,

December 1, 1939.

DEAR MR. —: A resolution was passed at the last annual meeting of the American Life Convention, directing the executive committee to prepare a vigorous and effective campaign of education for the purpose of advising Members of Congress of a possible purpose behind the present investigation by the Temporary National Economic Committee in Washington. It was thought advisable to warn them of the desire of some members of the Temporary National Economic Committee for Federal supervision of all life insurance, together with the taking over by the Government of industrial insurance, and merging it with the social-security system. During the course of the investigation savings-bank life insurance has been held up as a model institution in view of the fact that no agents' commissions are paid, and the agency system of selling life insurance has been severely criticized.

Pursuant to this resolution, the enclosed pamphlet has been prepared, and approved by the executive committee, with the thought that each State vice president of the convention would contact, through personal interviews, the Members of Congress from his State, and give them a copy of the pamphlet for their information. He could also ascertain the attitude of the Members of Congress toward the objectives of those members of the T. N. E. C. who desire Federal supervision and absorption by the Government of industrial insurance. I am sending you, under separate cover, 25 copies of the pamphlet. Should you desire any more from time to time please advise us and they will be forwarded to you promptly. Inserted in the pamphlet you will find a mimeographed copy of a recent address by Hon. James M. McCormack, commissioner of insurance and banking for the State of Tennessee.

The — companies in — are likewise members of the convention. I am sure that they will cooperate with you in this matter, and if you will contact them, asking that they see the Congressmen nearest their home offices, the work of interviewing all the Members of Congress from your State will be distributed so that your task will be considerably lessened. I am sending each company a copy of this letter so that they may be advised as to what is being done.

May I have your assurance that you will see to it that every Member of Congress and both Senators from your State are interviewed by you or by one of the executives of the member companies in your State.

We do not believe congressional members of the T. N. E. C. are in sympathy with the critical attitude of the departmental members in the investigation—criticism seems to come largely from the Securities and Exchange Commission and other departmental members of the Committee.

It will also be interesting to you to know that, at the present time, we are informed that the S. E. C. has 64 investigators among the companies, obtaining minute information as to conduct of the offices of the companies, examining files, etc. You are probably familiar with the questionnaire which was recently sent to all State insurance commissioners, inquiring closely into the conduct of the various State departments. It is our understanding that this questionnaire will be considered at the commissioners' meeting in Biloxi, Miss., December 6-9, inclusive.

Copies of the pamphlet are being sent to nonmember as well as member companies, and if you know some executives of nonmember companies in your State, I am sure they will assist in the work of contacting members of Congress.

I enclose a list of the Congressmen and Senators from your State. Will you please advise me from time to time, as you have interviewed them, what the results of your efforts have been.

If you desire further information, or if we can be of any assistance to you, please write me and I will be delighted to give you anything which the convention has on this matter.

Cordially,

C. B. ROBBINS,
Manager and General Counsel.

LIFE INSURANCE SHOULD BE SUPERVISED, REGULATED, AND GOVERNED BY LAW IN THE STATES

(American Life Convention, executive offices, 230 North Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill.)

This pamphlet is issued in pursuance of a resolution of the American Life Convention, adopted at its annual meeting in Chicago, Ill., on October 4, 1939, the resolution being as follows:

"Whereas the American Life Convention did on the 5th day of December 1905 adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, that we are opposed to any interference with State supervision and control of life-insurance companies, that Federal supervision is not expedient. * * * We endorse strict State supervision," and

"Whereas on the 10th day of October 1914, the convention did approve the following declaration:

"Inasmuch as an insurance congress is to be held at San Francisco in 1915, at which congress the subject of Federal supervision of life insurance is likely to be one of the topics under discussion, we recommend that any delegate or delegates of the American Life Convention to said insurance congress be instructed to advocate at all reasonable times the original declaration and the subsequently reiterated expressions of the American Life Convention in favor of State supervision and against Federal supervision, and to oppose all efforts to commit the insurance congress to Federal supervision, whether by constitutional amendment or otherwise," and

"Whereas, under the existing system of State supervision in the most trying times in the country's history by the faithful discharge of obligations, life-insurance benefits accruing to living insureds and beneficiaries of the deceased have unquestionably greatly relieved the economic stress and demonstrated the soundness of the institution of life insurance, and

"Whereas the record of performance of life insurance is proof of the efficiency and adequacy of State regulation;

"Now, therefore, the American Life Convention, composed of 154 life-insurance companies, with home offices in 40 States of the Union and the District of Columbia, does reaffirm its previous declarations of principle affecting examinations, favoring State supervision and opposing Federal regulation; and be it

"Resolved, That an organized effort be made to more fully inform the public, and that the executive committee of the American Life Convention be, and is hereby, authorized to take such action as by it may be deemed to be advisable to conduct a vigorous and effective campaign of education."

LIFE INSURANCE SHOULD BE SUPERVISED, REGULATED, AND GOVERNED BY LAW IN THE STATES

Life insurance is an institution serving 65,000,000 American citizens through more than 300 companies domiciled in virtually every State in the Union. Through this instrumentality the people of this country have accumulated savings of approximately $450 per policyholder. This is the result of a century of effort through individual initiative and is an achievement of free enterprise. In many ways it is uniquely an American institution, for while there are life-insurance companies in every nation in the world, almost two-thirds of all life insurance is held by thrifty Americans.

The amazing growth in life insurance didn't just happen; it was due to a number of causes. People came to realize that the system on which it was founded provided the greatest measure of safety for those seeking economic security. This public confidence was due to strict investment laws and thorough supervision in the various States, to the wise management of companies themselves, and to the earnest and conscientious efforts of 200,000 life underwriters who are the apostles of optimism, spreading the gospel of life insurance and its benefits to every nook and corner of the Nation.

Prior to the recent great depression life insurance had successfully weathered the disastrous effects of the crises of 1857, 1873, 1893, and 1907, meeting its obligations in full, while other financial institutions had failed in great numbers, with consequent losses to their investors and depositors. When the crisis of 1929 started the great depression, life insurance met this greatest stress of all with the same degree of reliability and solvency.

During the darkest days in the early years of the depression the life-insurance companies paid out to their policyholders $8,360,000 per day, and for the total of this period, ending in 1938, the sum of $23,590,268,703. They are continuing to meet their responsibilities and discharge their obligations with a full measure of financial honor. For more than half of our population, consisting of frugal and thrifty people who endeavor to provide not only for their loved ones in case of death, but for their own old age as well, life insurance is the greatest social security in the world.

While a few companies had their reserves impaired by reason of the tremendous fall in the value of securities, the total loss to policyholders by reason of liens imposed upon their reserves in companies which failed, amounted to less than two-thirds of 1 percent of the total sum entrusted to the companies by their policyholders.

It is unfortunate that this magnificent structure which has been built by the thrift and frugality of our citizens, and maintained through strict State laws, thorough supervision, and able management, should be subjected to an unjust and unfair attack.

The investigation now being carried on by the Temporary National Economic Committee was primarily authorized for the purpose of investigating monopoly in the United States. The actual investigation of life insurance as carried on through the instrumentality of the Securities and Exchange Commission has wandered far afield from this stated purpose and from the original intent of the investigation as proposed in the message of the President to the Congress suggesting an investigation, from the resolution of Congress itself authorizing it, and from the statement of William O. Douglas, then Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, made on February 6, 1939, in which he defined the purpose of the investigation. Until recently it has been difficult to evaluate the motives behind the Securities and Exchange Commission investigation. After starting out with an investigation of the election of directors in mutual companies, the Committee passed to an investigation of premium rates, lapsation, agency turn-over, agency commissions, and in fact has run the gamut of nearly every phase of life-insurance activity except that which it was authorized to investigate, and the investigation itself has been critical to the extreme. No opportunities have been given for companies to reply to insinuations in questions as to their practices, nor have the witnesses been permitted to make full statements while answering trick questions propounded to them by the counsel. In fact, the tenor of the investigation is that of a prosecution rather than an impartial inquiry, and anything of a critical character has been headlined and publicized through every facility at the command of the Securities and Exchange Commission. The entire course of the investigation as conducted and the attitude of those charged with conducting it would indicate that the ultimate object of the investigation is to build up a case against State supervision and for Federal control of the business. The evidence introduced in regard to industrial life insurance would indicate an intention to recommend the introduction of a bill which has as its object the virtual elimination of all private industrial life insurance in the United States by enlarging the scope of the activities of the Social Security Board to provide for such industrial life insurance at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States.

The United States Government entered the life-insurance business during the war as a means of life-insurance protection for the men engaged in military service. The total war-risk insurance issued to 4,529,000 individuals at one time amounted to $39,606,000,000, and the total amount of premiums paid on this insurance to September 30, 1939, is $453,973,000, and there has been paid in death and total permanent disability claims thereunder the sum of $2,048,000,000, and about $218,000,000 more will be required to complete the monthly installment benefits under this insurance.

United States Government life insurance since the war has decreased to $2,546,144,568, and has been carried on with the entire cost of administration paid from the general fund of the United States Government raised through taxation. Nevertheless the cost to policyholders is little, if any, less than that which could be obtained in a number of representative private companies.

Should the United States Government take over the business of industrial life insurance and merge it with the Social Security Act the overhead cost thereof would be borne by the people of the United States through taxation, just as the overhead cost of the present Government life insurance is borne.

The natural inquiry which comes to the mind of any impartial observer is the question as to any necessity of interfering with and upsetting the present magnificent structure of life insurance in order to have the Government of the United States, with an enormous cost to its people, further enlarge its activities in this field, and the further question as to why it is necessary for the Federal Government to endeavor to regulate, supervise, and control life insurance companies when the very record of the institution of life insurance itself speaks louder than any words can speak for the efficiency of State regulation, and the wise protection afforded policyholders by the various laws throughout the States governing life insurance.

Let us now consider briefly the reasons why supervision of life insurance should be maintained under State jurisdiction rather than Federal jurisdiction.

ADVANTAGES OF STATE SUPERVISION

The State system of regulation by commissioners enables quick decisions on timely subjects and the decentralization of this system makes possible the application of individual attention to special circumstances within each particular locality. The exigent nature of the business demands that the offices of authority be instantly available when needed. State commissioners, being local men familiar to the community, are accessible to the policyholder, the small company, and the large company alike.

Necessary regulatory adventures in new fields, although designed to be beneficial, may be disastrous for lack of means to judge their effects. Under decentralized State supervision the consequences of these mistakes are localized and the very sine qua non of insurance—wide distribution of risk—proves its worth. By withdrawal from a State, the strength of a national structure may be saved from the well-intended but misguided requirements of a single supervisory authority. No escape would be possible from the errors of a Federal authority.

The dangers which would beset the industry should such an abundance of power and responsibility be centralized in one person's hands are manifest. Today these decisions, so vital to the security of the entire Nation, are the product of the independent observations of the commissioners of 48 States, the District of Columbia, and the Territories, brought together in the national meetings and frequent conferences of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, to be sifted and tested by the experience of men familiar with peculiarities of each corner of the country. State supervision is good or bad, according to the merits of the best of this commissioners, whereas Federal supervision must be good or bad according to the qualities of one man, unchecked by the work of coordinate officials.

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners, which comprises within its membership the insurance governing body of every State and Territory in the Union, has its committees dealing with every phase of life insurance, and a system of coordination of laws, rules, and regulations has been built up by this body which has synchronized the general supervision of life insurance, while leaving State laws free to deal with conditions peculiar to any one State. The growth of life insurance in volume and its strength attest the efficiency of this method of supervision.

DISADVANTAGES INHERENT IN TRANSFER OF CONTROL

Transition to Federal supervision would mean the abandonment of a great body of common law which time alone can replace. Years of litigation have so thoroughly tested and interpreted the now generally standardized provisions of the State insurance codes that obligations may be undertaken with the degree of certainty which is essential to a business founded on legal relationships. Policy forms and general practices have been developed and designed to conform to these laws so construed.

Companies doing business in several States would be answerable to one authority—the Federal Government—while a company doing business entirely within its home State would be answerable to another—the State government. The competitive advantage to be had in differences between the laws governing a nationally supervised and a locally supervised company operating in the same State will foster a rivalry for legislative favoritism. A business now united in its appeal for just and nondiscriminatory legislation would be divided in a struggle for regulatory advantage.

DISADVANTAGES OF FEDERAL SUPERVISION

Federal supervision would serve only to centralize still further the power of our central government where there is already too much centralization.

There is no indication that a National Administrator of Insurance would be any more efficient than State commissioners.

The past record of Federal administration of various commercial activities, such as the railroads and the national banks, certainly has nothing to commend it by way of success.

Life insurance recognizes the need of supervision for its own good as well as in the interest of policyholders and the public. It is mostly concerned, however, in the quality of supervision and naturally shrinks from dual supervision. It does not believe that all State laws (both case and statutory) governing the relation between insurer and insured can be replaced by a body of Federal laws, and only in such case can we have Federal supervision. Supervision and regulation must derive authority from the same source whence come the laws regulating the business supervised.

It is utterly impossible to have a centralized Federal Code which could govern the investment functions of the companies' business, for the reason that conditions differ so widely in various parts of the country that what is advisable under conditions in New York, and now permitted by law there, would be inadvisable under conditions prevailing in some Western or Midwestern State and its laws.

Centralized control of life insurance by a single governmental agency naturally arouses apprehension of political tampering with the investment of trust funds of the most sacred character. We frankly fear that the power of coercion inherent in supervision by a single Federal bureau might be used to force the financing of Federal projects, economic experiments, and pet political schemes by successive administrations.

Any proposal for Federal supervision and control would not emanate from policyholders—its source would be purely political—and should one of the principal purposes behind it be to secure indirect but effective dominion over the $30,000,000,000 held in trust by the companies, its accomplishment would be a calamity. Few things are more important to more people in America than keeping politics out of life insurance. The decentralized nature of State supervision minimizes such a danger. The centralized character of Federal control would magnify it.

If it is proposed to superimpose Federal supervision upon State supervision, as has been vaguely hinted by some members of the Temporary National Economics Committee, you would have Federal supervision making a decision in one State which would be contrary to the decision it would have to make in another State, due to the divergence of State laws, and the whole matter of supervision would be involved in such a mass of contradictory decisions that the only result would be a continued harassing of companies who would be trying to serve two masters at the same time.

PRESENT STATUS OF LIFE INSURANCE AS DETERMINED BY THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

The status of insurance as commerce was first brought before the Supreme Court of the United States in 1863, and that Court decided in the case of Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall. 168), that insurance contracts were not articles of commerce in any sense of the word, and the decision in that case was not questioned until 1913, when the Supreme Court in deciding the case of New York Life Ins. Co. v. Deer Lodge County (231 U. S. 495), held:

"The character of a policy of insurance as a personal contract is not changed by their number or the residence of the parties, by centralization of control at the home office, by employment of agents with limited authority, nor by great and frequent use of the mails," and decided that life insurance was not commerce. This line of decisions has been upheld in more than 20 cases by the Supreme Court and as recently as 1938. The Honorable Frank N. Julian, superintendent of insurance of Alabama, and then president of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners, in discussing this line of decisions, said last December:

"Shall the sound decisions of our highest courts be set aside that new powers may be taken over and lodged in centralized Federal bureaus? Shall the rights of the State be ruthlessly cast aside? Shall the supervision through State departments—a plan that for 70 years has proven its worth and aided in building the greatest insurance system in the world—be delegated to the long list of powers usurped by Federal agencies? Shall the great institution of insurance be placed beside those business enterprises that cannot develop because of red tape * * *?"

SUMMARY

To summarize, the life-insurance business is being conducted economically and with a degree of financial honor and integrity unsurpassed by any other financial institution. It has grown and prospered under State supervision until it has become the greatest financial institution of the United States and has grown because the people have confidence in it. Federal supervision at best would be an illogical and probably an unconstitutional arrogation of power to the detriment of State sovereignty and State rights.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. O'MAHOONEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. It may be that representatives of some of the Government agencies that have been engaged in searching for evidence and obtaining data—and they have searched very diligently in the files of many of the corporations of the United States—have inadvertently or otherwise conveyed the idea that certain policies were adopted, or would be adopted, or ought to be adopted, by the committee. I have heard suggestions that statements which have been attributed to representatives of some of the agencies that have been investigating or making the surveys have not always been clear and fair, and that they have conveyed an erroneous idea, namely, that a department of the Government intended to take over certain activities that now belong to private endeavor.

Mr. O'MAHOONEY. Let me say in that connection that two suggestions particularly were made: First, that it was the intention of the S. E. C., which is represented upon the committee and which has been conducting the insurance study, to undermine the agency system and to provide that industrial insurance shall be taken over by the Government. I have inquired of Commissioner Leon Henderson, who has been most active in the work of the committee, and of Mr. Gerhard Gesell, counsel for the S. E. C. in charge of this study, and both these gentlemen concur absolutely in the statement that there is no basis for either of these charges.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Wyoming has made this explanation because in common with other Members of Congress I have had many letters regarding it.

However, I want the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

PRIVATE LOANS TO FINLAND

Mr. HARRISON. I ask to have read to the Senate an editorial which appeared in the Washington Daily News of today with reference to a question about which we have heard much, namely, loans to Finland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PRIVATE LOANS TO FINLAND

A proposal that Finland be invited and helped to sell bonds to American private citizens, using the proceeds to buy war materials, comes from Senator PAT HARRISON.

Others in Congress are said to favor it. A leading Republican, Col. Frank Knox, approved it yesterday. The administration itself, according to reports in Washington, may encourage this proposal.

We hope the reports have foundation. Finland desperately needs fighting equipment. Without that, her leaders say, she is doomed. The skill and courage which have won her America's unbounded admiration cannot prevail against Russia's overwhelming advantage in manpower and resources.

Considerations of foreign and domestic policy are raised against a United States Government war loan to Finland. These objections would not apply to a loan subscribed privately. The argument we do hear against the Harrison proposal is that private investors might be unwilling to risk their money in Finland's bonds.

That argument does no credit to the American people. They have praised Finland for paying previous debts. They have cheered Finland on to resist Russia's brutal assault. We believe that many wealthy Americans, and many not so wealthy, would gladly risk mere dollars where the Finns are risking their lives.

The wealthy, especially, should consider Finland's bonds a good investment in the best prospect that the westward push of communism may be stopped before it becomes a greater menace to our own country. And from a purely material aspect, as Senator HARRISON points out, even eventual defeat of Finland would not mean total loss to Americans who lend her private funds, since if the bonds became worthless a "bad debt" deduction could be made in income-tax returns.

If adequately assisted, Finland will not lose; and if Finland doesn't lose, neither will her creditors.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I do not know whether I will ask for its consideration—it will depend largely on the bill which is now pending in the Foreign Relations Committee—but I submit at this time a concurrent resolution and ask that it lie on the table. I request that the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 37), as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Congress that the Securities and Exchange Commission should provide for and expedite the registration of any bonds, securities, or other obligations issued by the Republic of Finland, or any of its political subdivisions, upon application made to such Commission for such purpose by the Republic of Finland, or by any representative committee of citizens of the United States hereafter organized and duly authorized to act on behalf of the Republic of Finland for the purpose of obtaining funds through the sale of such bonds, securities, or other obligations.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, with reference to the concurrent resolution, I may say, of course, that it is not necessary for the Congress to take any action in order that a group of citizens representing Finland may go before the Securities and Exchange Commission and apply for registration of bonds or securities for sale in the United States. That can be done without any action upon the part of Congress; but if, in the course of events that might arise, it should become desirable that some expression of the sense of the Congress be made, then I merely want the concurrent resolution to lie on the table for a subsequent vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, February 2, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1940

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord and Saviour, Thou who dost appeal to us from every crowded street, from every bed of pain, and from every troubled heart, do Thou inspire us to speak the brave word, do the courageous deed, and to openly confess Thee before men. Each day from Thy bountiful hand Thou dost shower blessings upon us; we thank Thee. Grant us the heart of a little child, that we may be strong to obey, quick to serve, and ready to wait. Do Thou put upon all of our hearts those who need us most, those whose grief is silent and settled, those who are living a life of evil and have never sought the beauty of the Lord. O Thou with whom power remaineth, do Thou inspire us to pour courage and strength into the lives of the weak and helpless and thus link ourselves with the kingdom of God upon earth. Bless and preserve the dignity and the honor of the traditional institution of our Republic which is honored and recognized today. Grant, O Lord God, that truth and justice may ever be the inspiration of its decisions. Like an impartial sunlight bless our whole land and Thine shall be the glory, through Christ, our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, on last Tuesday, January 30, I was granted unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a statement made by Hon. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the Farm Bureau Federation, before the Ways and Means Committee. I have been advised that the statement exceeds the amount fixed by regulation of the Joint Committee on Printing by an amount which I understand to be about a page and a half. Therefore I renew my unanimous-consent request that the entire statement may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

TREASURY DECISION NO. 49682

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution (H. Res. 361) from the Committee on Ways and Means and ask that the report may be read in lieu of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOPER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following adverse report (to accompany H. Res. 361):

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 361) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the House of Representatives a copy of Treasury Decision No. 49682, together with all cognate and relevant information pertaining to its formulation, adoption, and promulgation, and certain other information relative thereto, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House and recommend that the resolution do not pass.

The action of the committee is based upon the following report from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Washington, January 26, 1940.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Further reference is made to your communication of January 22, 1940, enclosing a copy of H. Res. 361, "Calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information concerning Treasury Decision No. 49682, relating to American fisheries," and stating that your committee will be pleased to receive the Department's views on the proposed legislation.

Paragraph 1730 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (U. S. C. title 19, sec. 1201, par. 1730 (a)) provides in part that "products of American fisheries, prepared or preserved by an American fishery, on the treaty coasts of Newfoundland, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, as such coasts are defined in the Convention of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, shall be exempt from duty." T. D. 49682, among other things not here relevant, amended article 489 (c) of the Customs Regulations of 1937 by redefining the term "American fisheries." Prior to its amendment by T. D. 49682, article 489 (c) of the Customs Regulations of 1937, issued in pursuance of paragraph 1730 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930, defined American fisheries as follows:

"American fishery within the meaning of said paragraph is defined as a fishery operated under the American flag by American vessels in foreign waters, in which such vessels have the right, by treaty or otherwise, to take fish and other marine products."

Article 489 (c) of the Customs Regulations of 1937, as amended by T. D. 49682, now defines American fisheries as follows:

"An American fishery, within the meaning of paragraph 1730 (a), is defined as a fishing enterprise conducted under the American flag by vessels of the United States on the high seas or in foreign waters in which such vessels have the right, by treaty or otherwise, to take fish or other marine products and may include a shore station operated in conjunction with such vessels by the owner or master thereof."

It will be noted that T. D. 49682 retained the original definition of American fisheries but added thereto by specifically providing that such fisheries could include a shore station operated in conjunction with the vessels engaged in fishing.

The situation which subsequently gave rise to the amendment to article 489 (c) of the Customs Regulations of 1937 by T. D. 49682 was first brought to the attention of the Department in a communication dated February 7, 1938, from the Assistant Secretary of State, which enclosed a despatch from the American Consul General at St. Johns, Newfoundland, calling attention to a fishery venture proposed to be undertaken by the General Seafoods Corporation with the aid of the government of Newfoundland. The fishery venture, which was at the time in its formative stage, provided for the establishment by the Newfoundland government of a plant and equipment on the treaty coast to be rented to the General Seafoods Corporation, and fish taken by vessels owned by that corporation were to be processed at this plant. The proposed agreement also called for the granting by the Newfoundland government of certain special customs exemptions for machinery and equipment for the plant to be imported into Newfoundland from the United States. The Assistant Secretary of State requested the Department's views as to whether or not the products of the proposed fishery venture would be subject to countervailing duties under the provisions of section 303 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (U. S. C., title 19, sec. 1303), and whether or not such products would be entitled to free entry as products of an American fishery.

On March 23, 1938, the Assistant Secretary of State was advised that on the basis of the meager information available concerning the proposed venture, the Department was inclined to the view that no countervailing duties would be imposed on the products of such venture. The Assistant Secretary of State was further advised that the Department did not have sufficient information to render any opinion on the question of whether or not the products of the proposed venture would be entitled to be regarded as products of an American fishery. Additional information was subsequently furnished by the State Department, and a lengthy brief was filed by the General Seafoods Corporation setting forth in detail the proposed plan for the establishment of the fishery and advancing legal arguments in support of its contention that the proposed venture would constitute an American fishery within the meaning of paragraph 1730 (c) of the Tariff Act of 1930. The General Seafoods Corporation requested a ruling on the tariff status of the fish processed under the proposed plan.

An independent legal study was made by the Department of the question of whether the products of the fishery operations proposed to be conducted by the General Seafoods Corporation would be subject to classification as products of an American fishery and thus entitled to free entry under paragraph 1730 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930. The conclusion was reached that this question should be answered in the affirmative. This conclusion was based on decisions by the customs court in cases involving the question of products entitled to free entry as products of American fisheries. For example, in the case of United States v. Gorton-Pew Fisheries Co. ((1914) T. D. 34440, abstract 35520), the customs court had before it for consideration a case in which fish caught by citizens of Newfoundland were taken to the Newfoundland shores and there prepared and preserved for shipment to the United States. These operations were conducted under the supervision of an American vessel which served as a center of operations. The court held that these products were entitled to free entry as products of the American fisheries. (See also decisions by the customs court in United States v. W. B. Redding et al. ((1910) T. D. 31028); United States v. Post Fish Co. ((1914) T. D. 34188); Geo. S. Bush & Co. (Inc.) et al. v. United States ((1925) T. D. 40725); and Robbins Inc. v. United States ((1925) T. D. 40728).

In view of the conclusion reached, it was deemed advisable to redefine the term "American fisheries" so as to specifically include shore stations, and to make certain other changes not here relevant in section 489 of the Customs Regulations of 1937. Accordingly, T. D. 49682 was issued to accomplish these changes, and a copy thereof is enclosed for your information.

The foregoing has summarized briefly, but completely, all the information which this Department has on the subject of House Resolution 361. In addition, the Department will be happy to make its file on this subject available to your committee or to any Member of Congress you desire. Since this file is in active use and officers of the Department have frequent occasion to refer to it, the Department hopes you will find it agreeable to have any such inspection of the original file made at the Bureau of Customs, where the file is located. If you deem it necessary, however, the Department will make a copy of all the material in the file on this subject (which is rather extensive) and send it to you, although this will, naturally, involve some expense. The Department understands that any examination of this file will be for official use and not for general publication. Since the file contains references to data affecting international relations as well as data bearing on the business affairs of a private corporation, the Department, in accordance with its long-established practice, would not feel at liberty to make it available for publication.

Since the Department is perfectly willing to place at your disposal all the information and material on this subject contained in its files, no necessity is seen for the adoption of House Resolution 361, and the Treasury Department must, therefore, recommend against such adoption.

Very truly yours,

HERBERT E. GASTON,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. R. L. DOUGHTON,
*Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives*

CUSTOMS
(T. D. 49682)

Customs regulations amended—Products of American fisheries
Article 489 (b), (c), (d), and (f), Customs Regulations of 1937, amended to redefine American fisheries so as to include shore stations operated in conjunction with vessels of the United States, and for other purposes

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS,
Washington, D. C.

To Collectors of Customs and Others Concerned:

Pursuant to the authority contained in section 251 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C. title 19, sec. 66) and section 624 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (U. S. C. title 19, sec. 1624), paragraphs (b), (c), (d), and (f) of article 489 are hereby amended to read as follows:

(b) No entry is required for fish or other marine products taken on the high seas by vessels of the United States or by residents of the United States in undocumented vessels owned in the United States when such fish or other products are brought into port by the taking vessel.

(c) An American fishery, within the meaning of paragraph 1730 (a), is defined as a fishing enterprise conducted under the American flag by vessels of the United States on the high seas or in foreign waters in which such vessels have the right, by treaty or otherwise, to take fish or other marine products, and may include a shore station operated in conjunction with such vessels by the owner or master thereof.

(d) The employment of citizens of a foreign country by an American fishery is permissible, but the purchase by an American fishery of fish or other marine products taken by citizens of a foreign country on the high seas or in foreign waters will subject such fish or other marine products to treatment as foreign merchandise.

(f) Products of an American fishery will be entitled to free entry although prepared, preserved, or otherwise changed in condition, provided the work is done at sea by the master or crew of the fishery or by persons employed by and under the supervision of the master or owner of the fishery. Fish (except cod, haddock, hake, pollock, cusk, mackerel, and swordfish) the product of an American fishery, landed in a foreign country, and there not further advanced than beheaded, eviscerated, packed in ice, frozen and with fins removed, will be entitled to free entry, whether or not such processing is done by the American fishery. Products of an American fishery prepared or preserved on the treaty coasts of Newfoundland, Magdalen Islands, or Labrador, as such coasts are defined in the convention of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, will be entitled to free entry only if the preparation or preservation is done by an American fishery.

FRANK DOW,
Acting Commissioner of Customs.

Approved August 12, 1938:

STEPHEN B. GIBBONS,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

[Filed with the Division of the Federal Register August 18, 1938, 9:47 a. m.]

Mr. COOPER (interrupting the reading of the adverse report). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the letter be dispensed with and that the letter, along with a copy of the regulations, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I shall only ask brief recognition. I understand the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] wants to make a brief statement, and I yield to him.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to the courtesy of the committee in granting me an opportunity to examine this report. I have no objection to the disposition proposed, but I understand this is without prejudice to any further resolution that might be introduced if it should be found that further documents would be desirable, a matter I propose to discuss with the members of the committee.

Mr. COOPER. Of course, the gentleman does not waive any rights he has under the rules of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be laid on the table. The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a speech I made at a dedication of a Federal building, together with the program of the ceremonies and certain small excerpts in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri and Mr. NELSON asked and were given permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

REREFERENCE OF CERTAIN BILLS

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bills H. R. 6800, H. R. 6827, and H. R. 7693, and that said bills be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what does this do?

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I will say to the distinguished minority leader that we are simply having these bills referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions instead of the Committee on Pensions, to which they were originally referred. They should properly go to the Invalid Pensions Committee, which has jurisdiction of the subject matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, we are here today to consider the needs of American agriculture, and there will no doubt be discussion of the question of the price of farm commodities. In this connection I want to read a few quotations to the House very briefly.

The first one is from the great economist Ricardo, who said:

That commodities rise or fall in proportion to the increase or diminution of money I assume as a fact that is incontrovertible.

Another one from President Andrew Jackson:

If Congress has the right under the Constitution to issue paper money, it was given them to be used by themselves, not to be delegated to individuals or to corporations.

From John Stuart Mill:

That an increase of the quantity of money raises prices and a diminution lowers them is the most elementary proposition in the theory of currency, and without it we should have no key to any of the others.

And I may add that prices of basic farm commodities respond to monetary influences much more quickly than any other commodities that we have.

W. P. A. FUNDS FOR PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House. Pennsylvania recently began a fight for justice in the matter of W. P. A. jobs for her hungry citizens, the State being away below the comparative quota of the other States. It is my very happy privilege to announce to the House this morning that late yesterday we were informed that 5,000 more jobs were allotted to Pennsylvania. These 5,000 jobs, coupled with 10,000 more jobs recently allotted to the State, raises its total quota to 165,000. We assume that there will be no question that the jobs will be filled by W. P. A. officials, and in behalf of Pennsylvania, it gives me singular pleasure to express the Keystone State's deep gratitude to those kindly officials who have brought this about, and if they do what they are indicating they will do, Pennsylvania is not going to be mad at anyone. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks, and include an editorial from the Providence Journal, commenting upon the speech of the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., at Topeka, Kans.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from Cloyd W. Miller, president of the Hickory Clay Products Co., of Mineral City, Ohio, to Jesse Jones, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8202) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, when the Committee rose last night we had read the first paragraph of the bill. I ask that the Clerk continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, for many long hours I have remained on this floor listening to the debate on this bill, hoping that those who brought it here could in some way justify their action, hoping they could explain why they expect the farmers of this Nation to continue to accept and be satisfied with a 79-cent dollar, to buy their necessities of life, while industry enjoys a $1.22 dollar with which to buy the farmers' commodities. All I have heard is excuses and that is one thing I hate.

Those responsible for this bill, which cuts farmers' benefits 51 percent under last year, say that, "Of course, farmers are entitled to parity, but—"; that "Of course, additional funds should be appropriated for removal of surplus commodities, but—"; that "Of course, the farm-tenant program should be continued, but—."

Well, I for one want to serve notice that those of us who understand and appreciate the economic condition facing the farmers of this Nation are not going to take it lying down. We intend to ask the Members of this House to vote for amendments to provide parity payments, to provide funds for the removal of surplus agricultural commodities and for funds to continue the tenant farm purchase program. The last two have been requested by the President, and the first—parity payments—is demanded by the farmers.

There are 40 members of the Committee on Appropriations and a great many of them exclaim to the high heaven of their loyalty to the farmers. Yet I understand this bill was reported to us by a vote of 26 to 9 in that committee. A great part of the time for the last 2 days has been consumed by members of that committee bemoaning the fate and destitute condition of the farmer, and yet they bring us a bill which is entirely contrary to the sentiments they express so fervently.

I feel that the Members should today be given the opportunity to decide whether they wish to meekly follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], or stand up and fight for the 32,000,000 Americans who till the soil.

We must decide today whether we shall appropriate billions for military defense against an enemy that does not exist and leave undefended the millions who must produce the food and fiber to feed and clothe the Nation.

We must decide today whether the greatest potential market on earth—the American farmer—will be given an equal opportunity to share in the prosperity and promise of this great Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Office of Experiment Stations, $7,104,735, of which amount not to exceed $150,105 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia, and not to exceed $750 shall be available for the purchase of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of field work outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, later on in this bill an attempt will be made by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] to restore to this bill money which was approved by the Bureau of the Budget for the carrying on of the disposal of so-called surplus commodities, and therefore for a continuation and possible expansion of the so-called stamp plan which has been developed. Four hundred American communities have applied to the Surplus Commodities Corporation to have this plan put into operation in their community. I am asking to speak at this time because I do not know what the situation will be when the time comes to discuss that amendment. Neither do I know what form the opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman will take.

I would like to say in the first place that if the gentleman from Georgia had not offered this amendment I would have offered one, for I believe this is one of the most constructive moves that has so far been made to get at the solution of the agricultural problem. It has, so far as I know, the approval of every section of our population.

To a great extent, the objection to the agricultural program which has been in effect the last few years has been that it cut down production. This stamp plan does exactly the opposite. It enables the people of this country to apply that money in the purchase of commodities through the regular distributive channels, and the farmers to receive payment at the regular price for those commodities. The gentlemen who oppose this amendment will be doing this: They will be saying that they are opposed to seeing the people who are working on W. P. A. or even getting a smaller income than that in some cases, having $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per meal for food instead of 5 cents. That is what this plan has meant. They will be saying that the $2\frac{1}{2}$ -cent increase for the undernourished people of this country is going to be taken away—the increase made possible through this stamp plan simply by the fact that American agriculture is as efficient as it is. Those who oppose that amendment will be opposing this increase in the consumption by our people of the most necessary foods, which results in a more decent payment to our farmers for the things they have already produced. I cannot understand opposition to this. I cannot understand how anybody can be opposed to a measure of this kind.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. TARVER. Of course, I think the gentleman knows I am as deeply interested in the appropriation for purchase of surplus commodities as any Member, but the gentleman realizes the futility of offering an amendment to a bill for an appropriation not authorized by law?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I thank the gentleman. I do realize his interest. I am hopeful that the amendment that will be offered will not be subject to a point of order, and I do not believe it will be. Furthermore, I think legislative authorization for this program should have been passed by Congress long before this. But I am certain that over a period of time there have been a great many appropriations made which have not been technically authorized any more than this one, and I feel very deeply that the need of the Nation at this moment in this regard is a matter so close to any true definition of national defense that it ought not be opposed, and a point of order ought not be raised against it. That is the feeling I have about it.

Evidently this Congress will be confronted with other types of problems that it will be asked to act upon. I am extremely concerned about the possibility of our doing something for certain of the nations of the world that have been attacked in an unwarranted manner, but we are going to be subject to serious and entirely justifiable criticism unless we concern ourselves about so elemental a matter as enabling people whose budget for food is only 5 cents per meal to increase it to $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents by making use of farm commodities already produced. As I have said so many times before, the question of the Budget need not be involved at all if we would take sensible action with regard to our idle gold and silver or else learn what money and the credit of this great Nation really are.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for an additional 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for an additional 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, it has been a difficult thing to get a little time to speak or say a word on this all-important measure from the standpoint of the farmers of America.

This bill has been severely trimmed, trimmed to the point of being absolutely and wholly unfair to the American farming class; so I want to talk to you about it just a little bit and, if I may, to make a few suggestions which seem to me to be pertinent to this inquiry.

In the first place, it is wholly unnecessary for me to state what has been stated so many dozens of times even in the last 2 days of this debate about the condition of the farmer and what is happening to him. It is a shame to this Congress that the farming class of people are reduced to an income of less than $175 per annum, on an average, per family. We know that no man can live even halfway decently himself, let alone trying to support a family, when that kind of condition prevails. We have tolerated this condition, however, for the 6 years I have been in Congress, and an effort is now going to be made further to tolerate it. So far as I personally am concerned, I do not propose to deviate from the position I heretofore have taken. I have stood for the cost of production for the farming class of people in this country, and they are entitled to no less than this. If you give them cost of production for that portion of their goods produced on the farm and consumed in the country you are giving them no more than, and not as much as, the industrial classes of the country are getting now under the protection of the tariff and from other governmental agencies. Why should we not look after the farmer a little? True, we have made huge appropriations for agriculture, or appropriations that are supposed to be for agricultural purposes, but what is the farmer's situation? He may be a little better off right now from getting Government subsidies. He could not have gotten along without Government subsidies. Some features of this Agricultural Adjustment Act, of course, appealed to me and appealed to all of us, but on the whole this program for agriculture I believe has been a colossal failure, notwithstanding the voicing of an entirely different and opposite sentiment by my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Jones], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I love the gentleman from Texas. I believe he is one of the most amiable gentlemen in this House, but we ought to look at this thing properly and fairly and see if we cannot do something to relieve the most terrible condition of economics that any class of people in a free land, so far as I know, has ever been subjected to. Let us analyze this bill. What does it do? I will tell you very briefly what, in my opinion, is the legal meaning and effect of the present farm bill.

In the first place, the bill is geared only—and I believe I can say this advisedly—only to give bankrupt farm prices. How does it do it? Title III of section (a) of the 1938 act has to do with crop control and parity prices. Let us assume that farm prices of wheat, cotton, corn, rice, and tobacco should reach parity. First, under the bill there would be no parity prices for Congress to adjust or to pay. There is no authority for parity payments after a farm commodity has reached parity price. Should this condition arise, that a farm commodity reaches parity, crop control would have to be abandoned, because there would be no incentive for the farmer to submit to crop control; and there is not a farmer in America right now who would be in favor of any kind of crop control or supervision of his farm operations unless it was for the bait of a subsidy held out to him under this bill. The farmer is just like any other man, he wants to run his own business and have the Government keep its nose out of it—not particularly the Government but I would say the Department of Agriculture. If parity is ever reached, there would be no need for that portion of the law which provides for parity payments as long as prevailing farm prices are below 75 percent of parity, and the law as it stands would be a useless and meaningless lot of printed matter on the statute books. In legal effect and operation, if 75 percent of parity is ever reached, the law will have spent its force and will be useless to any person.

The same would be true in regard to loans upon crops. There is no authority under the law to make a loan if 75 percent of parity price prevails on farm products mentioned in this law, the five basic crops of the country. What do you want it for if you attain parity? And listen to me: The Secretary of Agriculture has rightfully stated that under this law the American farmer can never hope for or expect either parity or cost-of-production prices. He has been begging Congress for better than a year to take this hot potato out of his own hands and put it in the laps of Members of Congress, but we have not done anything and there is a reason why we have not. This reason, in my mind, is that there are certain so-called farm organization managers or presidents in this country who do not want the law regulating loans on such crops and making parity payments to farmers under it done away with. They want to keep 108,000 or 110,000 employees in the Department of Agriculture so they will have some excuse to stay here in Washington pretending to represent the farmer, but in reality I believe the facts justify the statement that they are representing only themselves and not the farmers of the country.

The language of the law is as plain as can be that without a condition where the products of a farm must bring less than 75 percent of parity the farmer cannot get any benefit out of the law. Any man of intelligence can see that the law can certainly be of no benefit from a financial standpoint to an owner and operator of a farm or to a tenant on a farm, for these are the only instances in which either loans or parity payments are authorized under the law to be made to such owner or operator. In fact, the law itself in these respects is a deterrent and renders a distinct disservice to the farming class of people. Of course, the law does not specifically say that the prices of farm products shall never go above parity, but it does say that if the Government gives the farmer any assistance under the law it will not do so unless economic conditions are so bad that he cannot even obtain 75 percent of the parity price of his farm products when he goes to sell them.

Unhappily for the world, and particularly for the American farmer, there is in the offing what appears to be danger of war involvement to every nation on earth. The flaring up of such a holocaust as war might possibly bring temporarily higher prices for farm products, and the tendency of late, because of war conditions, is for crop prices to rise. If such a condition should be brought about, the farmer ought to be free to exercise his own judgment about when he sells and what he sells and at the price he shall sell it for. The Government of the United States ought not to try to hamper him by any loan of money that it may have made him heretofore and ought to let him get the best he can for himself out of his farm products. If the law remains in force and effect and prices of farm products soar because of war conditions or because of other conditions, nobody ought to have any authority by reason of any contract that he may have made with the Government of the United States through the Department of Agriculture or any other agency to hamstring the farmer by limiting him in the amount of any kind of crop he might want to grow. The only way, according to my notion, to be safe about it, in the best interests of the individual farmer of America, especially right now, is to turn him loose from any such obligations as quota allotments or limitation in production.

I agree with a great deal that the gentleman from Texas said in his statement yesterday. It was an appealing speech, it was a speech of sympathy in behalf of the farmers of the country—and God knows they need that sympathy—but I do not agree with all the gentleman from Texas said. Why? In his enthusiasm the gentleman from Texas made the statement that the farmer has been tremendously benefited, for instance, by the rural electrification program. That is all right, he has been; and it might be that if it had not been for the present bill the farmer would never have been able to get electricity out on his farm, but I did not know until the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] gave the intimation that the Department of Agriculture claimed benefits such as he mentioned. I agree with much of what he says, but I do not believe he really thinks the Department of Agriculture is entitled to the credit of propagating Thomas A. Edison.

They have propagated nearly everything else. I did not know until the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] made the statement that the Agriculture Department was entitled to the credit for propagating Mr. Edison in the world of electricity.

I would not say that the Committee on Agriculture of the House is to be censured for anything it has done. But I do say that since I have been in Congress there has been what is known as the cost-of-production bill constantly before this committee for consideration, making provision for the payment to farmers in the United States for all crops grown and consumed therein, which this committee has not seen proper to report out for consideration of the House. There is such a bill pending before the committee now, and a few months ago this committee refused to report out the bill notwithstanding that just a few weeks before their vote not to report the bill out for consideration of the House, the Senate had unanimously in its Committee on Agriculture, reported out the same and identical bill.

I have heard all the objections made to reporting out the cost-of-production bill, and I am liberal enough to concede that some of the reasons offered for not doing so are somewhat of a serious nature. One of these reasons has been that the Secretary of Agriculture in substance took the position that he did not know how to figure cost of production under the proposed bill. I believe in the fairness and sincerity of the Secretary of Agriculture and in those members of the House Committee on Agriculture who did not feel disposed to report out the cost-of-production bill; however, the Secretary of Agriculture does know how to figure parity prices because he has been at it for some length of time. Each month he gets out a bulletin showing his determination of the parity price of each agricultural product of consequence grown in the United States.

Now, the situation in regard to the farmer and his prospects of getting something done for him is so serious that all who are interested in the farm problem ought to try to compose their differences if they have any, and try to get a bill passed in Congress that will make a condition as near right as we can out of an entirely wrong and hurtful and unfair condition under which the farmer has been compelled to operate. We ought always to bear in mind that the farmer is entitled to live and support his family on his farm in about the same degree of decency that other people throughout the country enjoy. He has not been able to do this because he did not get enough out of his work and out of the products of the farm.

In order to approach this problem from a somewhat new angle, those of us who have been trying to promote the cost-of-production bill, and others who are just as seriously interested, I believe, in farm legislation as any of us, have drawn a bill which is an amendment to H. R. 2371—cost-of-production bill—which I believe will be a splendid start toward giving the farmer at least a degree of security that he has never heretofore known. We want something substantial, something permanent, something in the way of actual benefit to the American farmer enacted into law for the farmer's protection and for the protection of those dependent upon him. The amendment to which I refer is shown now in committee print under date of February 1, 1940. The main difference is the amendment and the cost-of-production bill is that the amendment uses the word "parity" price instead of the term "cost of production" price.

I wish it were possible for every farmer in America to get a copy of this committee print of the amended bill which directs the Secretary of Agriculture to ascertain on the first day of each month, parity price of every farm commodity grown in the United States and consumed in the United States, and makes it unlawful for any buyer or handler of any such product to pay to any farmer therefor less than the parity price to be promulgated each month of the year by the Secretary of Agriculture. If you give the farmer this, you give him the first substantial relief he has ever had. It is not what he is entitled to. He is, in my judgment, entitled to the full cost of production for every article grown by him.

Parity, however, is generally reputed to amount to 75 percent of the cost-of-production price. If we could start the farmer off with 75 percent of the cost-of-production price for his farm products grown in the United States and consumed in the United States, he will have an income of nearly twice as much as he is getting now for farm products. It will be a price out of which the stock gambler and manipulator cannot defraud him. There will be no stock gambler's prices on anything below that parity price. It will mean putting a price floor under each of the articles grown and produced in the United States of America and consumed in the United States of America, below which it shall be unlawful for anybody to purchase them. That means real security, even though it is not as much as cost of production.

The amended bill carries with it a provision protecting the right of the farmer to soil conservation and other payments, including crop insurance, as set forth in the following language:

Nothing in this act shall be held to repeal, amend, or modify the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, or section 201 (relating to adjustments in freight rates), section 202 (relating to new uses and markets for farm commodities), section 204 (relating to continuation of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation), section 302 (relating to loans on agricultural commodities), or title V (relating to crop insurance) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, or section 32, as amended, of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1935.

It is manifestly unfair for the committee reporting on this bill to cut out parity payments, particularly to the American farmer. Every farmer that pitched a crop in the United States in 1939 had the equivalent of assurance from the Congress of the United States under the law that he was going to receive parity payments if his farm products sold below 75 percent parity price. The committee has refused to recognize this agreement in the appropriation bill under consideration. It has not only done that, but it has cut out all appropriation for dry-land farming experimentation, and building tanks and ponds on farms, for land utilization, for shelterbelt, and for other items. It seems to be most inopportune that the committee has done the things they have done, and I hope that every item they have cut out will be restored, and that parity payments will be put in the bill before it is finally disposed of by the House and Senate, so that we will give the semblance at least of being behind our implied obligations to the farmers.

So far as I am personally concerned, I expect to vote for every one of these provisions to be put into this act, and up to the time I have made this address, I am happy to report that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in consideration of the bill, put into the bill the appropriation for dry-land farming experiments, and I trust and believe that all other things eliminated by the committee should go back into the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in accord with my colleague, than whom the farmer has no better friend in Congress, that the present Agricultural Act has proved to be a colossal failure. In fact, as I look back over some other agricultural acts under which we have operated, I am inclined to think that when compared with those it has much merit.

The Roosevelt administration has not failed agriculture, as did the Coolidge and Hoover administrations. I recall that under the Coolidge administration Congress by a very large majority approved the old McNary-Haugen bill, with the equalization-fee feature, and the President vetoed it with the most vicious veto that any farm measure had ever received. That veto represented a flood of abuse and a drought of ideas. A score of expressions, such as "bureaucratic paraphernalia," "vicious devices," "profoundly repugnant," and "autocratic domination," were used to describe a measure favored by farmers and approved by both branches of the Congress. Words, words, words, all strung together like scorpions on a string.

Mr. Chairman, I recall, too, that in the spring of 1929, at which time I was a member of the Agricultural Committee, the Congress was called in special session to do two things—bring about "equality for agriculture" and to pass a "limited" tariff bill. The meeting was called for the 15th day of April. It should have been for April 1, April Fool's Day, because no other Congress attempting or pretending to do justice to the farmer did more to fool the farmer. By June 15 the Agricultural Marketing Act, without the equalization fee, became a law. Many months later a tariff bill, familiarly known as the Hawley-Smoot bill, became a law. Under the workings of these two laws farm wreck and ruin followed.

I am glad to have been one of 35 Members of the House who at that time voted against the Hoover Agricultural Marketing Act. I will say to my colleague from Oklahoma, when you talk about gigantic failures, the Hoover Farm Board Act represented the greatest, the most colossal, the most gigantic failure of any pretense at doing justice to the farmer that we ever had.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Would the gentleman mind if I said I agree with him?

Mr. NELSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, President Hoover used two pens when he signed that bill. With one pen he wrote "Herbert" and with the other pen he wrote "Hoover." One of those pens was presented to the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture and the other to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture. I recall also that on the day the Hoover Farm Board bill went into effect some prices were: Sweet cream, 44 cents; prime cattle, $14.75; hogs, $11.15; wheat, $1.08; corn, 92 cents; and oats, 45 cents. I remember, also, that by 1932 prices had dropped so low that from my own farm I sold hogs at $2.80, wheat had gone to 25 and 30 cents, corn was selling at 10 to 15 cents per bushel, oats and rye about the same or less, and other things in proportion. With the inauguration of the Roosevelt administration and the repeal of the Hoover Agricultural Marketing Act, livestock and grain prices advanced until today they are more than double the ruinous 1932 prices. Of course, they ought to be higher. The farmer is entitled to the cost of production. He has not it, but he is much nearer than under Hoover.

So, Mr. Chairman, while agricultural legislation enacted under the Roosevelt administration does not in all respects represent my views, I do not agree that the results represent a colossal failure. Far from it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

ERADICATION OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH AND OTHER CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS

In case of an emergency arising out of the existence of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, threatens the livestock industry of the country, he may expend in the city of Washington or elsewhere any unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for this purpose in the arrest and eradication of any such disease, including the payment of claims growing out of past and future purchases and destruction, in cooperation with the States, of animals affected by or exposed to, or of materials contaminated by or exposed to, any such disease, wherever found and irrespective of ownership, under like or substantially similar circumstances, when such owner has complied with all lawful quarantine regulations: Provided, That the payment for animals hereafter purchased may be made on appraisement based on the meat, dairy, or breeding value, but in case of appraisement based on breeding value no appraisement of any animal shall exceed three times its meat or dairy value, and, except in case of an extraordinary emergency, to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, the payment by the United States Government for any animals shall not exceed one-half of any such appraisements: Provided further, That the sum of $5,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $3,500,000 contained in the Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1924, approved December 5, 1924, for the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease and other contagious or infectious diseases of animals, is hereby made available during the fiscal year for which appropriations are herein made to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to control and eradicate the European fowl pest and similar diseases in poultry.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the effort to reduce the expenditures of the Federal Government. I realize such efforts must be initiated by the Committee on Appropriations. However, I believe the committee has exercised rather poor judgment in seeking to make such drastic reductions on the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill. I have read and have before me the report of the committee on this bill, with particular reference to the heading "Reductions under Budget," on page 3. I have read that paragraph in the hope I might find some justification for the very drastic reductions that have been made.

As pointed out yesterday by the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], this bill carries a reduction of 51 percent of the appropriations made last year for the Department of Agriculture. I question whether the Committee on Appropriations will make such a drastic reduction in any of the other appropriation bills that will be passed by the House. I know such reductions have not yet been made in the appropriation bills passed at this session. I ask, Why, this bill dealing with the greatest of all undertakings of the Government and affecting directly 31 percent of our population and indirectly our entire population, the economy ax should be laid with such cruel force? Restoration of farm purchasing power is fundamental to national recovery. The Budget will never be balanced until the buying power of the farmer is restored, and when this is done the problems of industry and unemployment will automatically be solved.

I am also in sympathy with what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] said yesterday to the effect that the Committee on Appropriations, of course, has the right to determine and recommend the amount of appropriations; but he questioned the wisdom and authority of a committee of this House, a committee which is not the master of the House but the servant of the House, in eliminating entirely from a bill all appropriations for projects and activities which Congress, by its solemn vote, had decreed should be carried on. I believe the committee has exceeded, if not grossly abused, its authority in eliminating entirely all appropriations for projects which Congress has decreed should be carried on and which have been successfully carried on with advantageous results, not only to agriculture but to the country as well. The farm-tenant problem and other similar activities are ignored, and no appropriation is made for them whatever.

Time will not permit me to point out these various activities that have been eliminated from the bill, but I shall vote to restore many of them when amendments are offered, for they are important, not only to the farmers but for the general welfare and prosperity of the Nation.

For the moment let me recur again to that paragraph of the report of the committee attempting to justify these reductions, for which the committee gives an excuse but not a reason. I quote:

In conformity with the general policy of retrenchment of expenditures in Government establishments, this bill contains a very substantial amount of reduction under the Budget estimates.

I should say "substantial" is a rather modest word, when the reduction is 51 percent under last year's appropriation. I read further from the report:

Many functions have been eliminated in their entirety, and reductions have been effected in the greater portion of the individual items covering the Department's regular activities. It cannot be denied as to any of these cuts that they will diminish the benefits to agriculture resulting from the various activities under research of the kind which has been provided for in some instances over a period dating back almost to the beginning of the Department.

It is not only recent activities whose appropriation the committee has cut or eliminated; instead, as the committee admits in its report, some of the activities go back almost to the beginning of the Department of Agriculture.

Continuing from the report, I read:

However, it is generally conceded that if the Department were granted the full amount of the Budget covering the entire Government establishment, that useful results would be obtained through the enlargement of the research activities of the Department. There is no appropriation that has ever been made that can be said to be wholly adequate.

True, of course. I believe that statement is academic and not subject to argument. But because you can never make an appropriation that is adequate, why throw up your hands and say, "We will not make any appropriation, we will just cut it out"? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Dry-land agriculture: For the investigation and improvement of methods of crop production under subhumid, semiarid, or dry-land conditions, $100,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the establishment of any new field station.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: On page 31, line 20, strike out "$100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$226,828."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of the bill, 9 of these dry-land experiment stations will be abolished, as I understand, even if the Budget estimate is accepted, but, under the provision that is in the bill, a total of 17 of these stations will be abandoned.

These stations do a very valuable work in research and in determining the nature and type of crop that is suited to the particular locality in which they are operating. In many instances I know that local people have contributed the land to the Federal Government under a cooperative agreement under the terms of which these stations are to be maintained, and the States are contributing in many instances to their maintenance. For the difference between $100,000 and $226,000, or $126,000, these stations would be abandoned and the facilities which they have built up, and which have been built up by local people as well as by the States, would be done away with.

This seems to me to be a very poor type of economy. I certainly believe that when these stations have been doing such fine work and improving the type of crops it would be wise if the stations were continued, especially since the Farm Credit Administration, as well as the Farm Security Administration, have been using these stations in connection with making loans to farmers to determine whether or not loans should be made, or the amount in which the loans should be made.

Mr. Chairman, a number of Members are here who are directly interested in the various stations, and I want them to have a chance to present the various phases of the question if they desire to do so. I do not want to take up much time. I certainly believe, however, that these stations should be continued. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can come to some agreement on the time to be consumed in debate on this paragraph. How many Members desire to speak on this amendment? Eight Members have arisen, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment close in 50 minutes, 40 minutes of that time to be consumed by the gentlemen who have arisen, the remaining 10 minutes to be allotted to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in the first of my remarks I want to talk to some of my friends on the Republican side of the House. The other night the minority leader went out to Kansas and there made a speech to the people of the West, and to the people of the West the Republican leader in this House said:

Our front line for the United States is not anywhere in Europe, but is at the factory door and at the farm gate.

I do not want any action taken by the Republican Members of this House today to deny that speech or that statement which the minority leader made to the people of the West. [Applause.] And I appreciate the applause from the other side of the House.

We are approaching now the first vote on amendments offered to this particular bill. I want the gentlemen on this side of the House when they vote today not to vote blindly, not to deny what the minority leader said, but to remember that the front line, so far as this country is concerned, is at the factory door and the farm gate.

Now, what is this amendment we have before us? The amendment proposes to continue in operation or to permit the continuation in operation of the dry-land experiment stations, some of which have been going on for 40 years, scattered throughout 15 States in the West, covering one-fifth of the area of the United States. I put the names of the stations in the RECORD yesterday. There are 2 or 3 in Montana, 1 in Nebraska, 1 in Colorado, 2 or 3 in Texas, 1 in New Mexico, 1 in Wyoming, a couple in Oklahoma, 1 in Oregon, 1 in South Dakota, and 3 in Kansas. These stations get a very small amount of money, from $3,000 to $9,000 a piece. They derive most of their funds from what they produce in their experimental plots. The Federal Government owns from 60 to 360 acres of land in connection with these stations, and has its investment in buildings, lands, and equipment. The bill as drawn denies them funds and will let these places go to wrack and ruin.

The subcommittee found it possible to provide money to carry on tobacco investigations, cereal-food investigations, botany, soil microbiology, and all that kind of thing, but proposes to reduce funds for dry-land stations by 53 percent and wipe out 17 of them. They did this on an argument which I think the committee did not fully understand.

The only statement that was made in opposition to the items, as I understand, was, "We are buying up some of the land out West and why should we maintain these experiment stations?" Well, suppose you are buying up some of the land out West. In my State you are buying up less than one-fiftieth of all the land in the State—considerably less than that, about one seventy-fifth—and the same thing is true in these other Western States, and just because there has been some land bought in some of these States does not mean that those States have no productive land in them. The people are not moving out, most of them are there and will continue to live there. Why not help them to have the production suited to their conditions as you do elsewhere?

These stations are the stations that for years had been building up our weather records, our production records on wheat, our records on grass, our records on trees, so that the people who are living in these States may do the best they can. These individual stations do not get over $3,000 or $4,000 apiece, and yet because of what they are able to produce on these stations, with a little technical help, they are able to provide guidance for the farmers and the ranchers living in the West. On this first vote do not slap the West down. Our front line is at the farm gate. Support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas and continue these dry-land experiment stations. [Applause.]

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I think there should be no difference of opinion among thinking men on the question of scientific research—scientific research in industry, scientific research in the field of agricultural production and consumption. We must make the research in these experiment stations, and we are doing this work at a minimum of cost, if we are to pass on to the farmers in those communities and in the Nation the information that will enable them, under adverse conditions, to more nearly eke out an adequate income from their farming operations.

There is not a great sum of money involved in the amendment offered here. The complete sum for all 19 stations in this dry-land area, covering many States, is only $226,000; $226,000 spent in research in order that information may be distributed to thousands and to millions of farmers to the end that they can produce at lower cost a better product and sell it on the market and enable their farm operations to go forward.

EXPERIMENT STATION, BIG SPRING, TEX.

There can be no sense in the elimination of these stations. In my own congressional district at Big Spring, Tex., 25 years ago, at the request of the Federal Government, a donation of 130 acres was made in the outskirts of the city of Big Spring, and for 25 years the Department of Agriculture has been experimenting there with various plants, animals, and crop practices. Their experimental work in milo-maize feeding to beef cattle has been given national recognition. The experiments done in cotton culture have proven beneficial. The numerous developments in many fields at the Big Spring, Tex., station have been of untold value to thousands of farmers over a wide area and over a period of years.

It is not a great expense to operate this station. The cost is about $7,000 a year. Now they propose to use the economy act and chop off this work in order that we may save $7,000 a year; break the continuity of this work; deprive the Nation of a continuation of their development and experience there, in the false name of economy. It should not be done. It must not be done, and I believe it will not be done if the Members of this House will think seriously about this question at issue. Debate if you will about vast expenditures for other matters, but let us not quibble on a question so vitally important as the study of better farming methods at a minimum of expense in these 17 experiment stations over a wide area of the Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is a single item in this great appropriation bill which can be justified to any greater extent than the item which is included in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

I have personal knowledge of the work that these experiment stations are doing, because three of them are located in the State of Kansas, one of them in the county in which I live. I have followed their work for a great many years. For more than 25 years, in fact, I have had an opportunity to observe the work of this station in my home county. These stations are scattered throughout the Great Plains area, an area which is a problem area in this country. It is an area which has the richest soil in America. There is but one limiting factor to crop production in that area, and that is inadequate rainfall. But inadequate rainfall is not a serious handicap to farming in that area or in any other area, if we know the type of crops and the methods of farming which can be carried on successfully. That is what these stations have been doing. They have done enough work in the development of grain sorghums to pay the cost of all of these stations for 100 years, because they have developed a type of grain that can be grown successfully in that area.

Their work in that regard is not finished yet by any means, because year after year they are developing types that are disease-resistant, drought-resistant, and which are more productive. Progress can be noted year after year in what they are accomplishing through careful research in those stations. The station in my own county has done a great deal along the line of lamb feeding—the feeding of grain sorghums to lambs and other livestock in that area. That is a type of work which is very essential in that country, because it has resulted in greater diversification of agricultural activities. Other stations have done comparable work in projects which are of particular interest and benefit in the areas in which they are located.

The amount asked here is nothing as compared with the major items of this bill and as compared with the great work that is being done. These stations are now reaching the stage where their benefits are beginning to be realized, because this work is cumulative. Every year that these stations are in existence their results are verified, their experiments are extended. It takes a long period of time to work out these research problems. So that this year they are doing more and better work than they have ever done. Next year, if we give them the money to function, they will do better and more work than this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] is recognized.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, for nearly 10 years, since I came to this House, I have always followed the leadership of my lifelong friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] on agricultural matters. Next to him I regard as the best authority in this body, a man who has given great study to the farm problem, our Republican friend from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], who has just spoken. Here are our two outstanding leaders who have given years of study to this special problem and here is the Legislative Committee on Agriculture that has devoted days and even months to the study of these problems, and all of them strong for this amendment in spite of the opposition of some of our friends on the Appropriations Committee who cannot know so much about the situation. So there must be merit in it.

Now, we propose to reduce appropriations 10 or 15 or 20 percent as we are doing on the balance of the appropriations that come in, but on this matter we will just kill the child while we are at it. To me that is the height of folly as well as unfairness.

I just want to take a minute or two to confirm what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] said about the station at Big Springs, Tex. I do not have one of these stations in my district, but when I came to this House 10 years ago Big Spring was in my district, and I have personal knowledge of what those people have done down there and what has been accomplished. If you do not want to take my word for it, you ask the authorities over in the Department of Agriculture or in the extension service of Texas A. and M. College, and you will find out about the splendid work that has been done at the Big Spring station.

The people of that section gave the land for this station. Great good has been accomplished there, and I undertake to say that we are not acting in good faith with them and the people of these other communities when we absolutely abandon these experiment stations. If you want to reduce the appropriation, I shall not complain about that, because we are all yelling our heads off about economy, but when I think of some of the proposals about battleships and great Army appropriations, even from my own committee—and I am for a lot of them—and then say that an experimental station away out in the arid West, in a country like where I live, that is operating at an expense of only about $7,000 a year and that does 10 times that much good, then I say it is unfair and unjust to abandon it. Reduce the overhead if necessary, but do not kill it.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield briefly.

Mr. SOUTH. As the gentleman knows, I live in the same area in which the Big Spring station is located. I want to endorse what the gentleman has said. I would like to say briefly that we should not overlook the fact that the great industries of this country—steel, automobiles, and chemicals—are appropriating more money during recent years than they ever have before for research.

Mr. THOMASON. Everybody knows that, and now to say that these little stations out in North Dakota, South Dakota, New Mexico, Kansas, west Texas, and the arid country that are spending on an average only $7,000 per station, to say that these are to be completely abandoned is absolutely unfair. I plead with you to restore this item. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] is recognized for 3½ minutes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, first I want to establish in the minds of the Membership of the House beyond the realm of doubt that the actual result as stated by the Members who have talked are as they say. I hold in my hand a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry in which he states that every station except the regional station at Woodward and Mandan will have to be abandoned under this cut brought in by the committee. This is official from the man who administers the money. In this letter he states the amounts of money necessary to continue these stations; for instance to pick them at random—Huntley, Mont., $2,000; Tucumcari, under $8,000; and on down through the little stations, none of them using as much as $10,000 of Federal funds. Under permission granted in the House I wish to insert a letter from Dr. Auchter, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, a statement of the stations that would be closed and a short summary of the work of these stations:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,

HON. PHIL FERGUSON,

Washington, January 31, 1940.

House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FERGUSON: In accordance with the request which you made of me this morning, I am transmitting a statement showing what governmental stations will be abandoned and where cooperative work with State experiment stations will be discontinued as a result of the cut made in the dry-land agricultural appropriation of the Bureau of Plant Industry by the Bureau of the Budget, and the same information following the additional cut made by the Subcommittee on Agriculture of the House.

In addition, in accordance with your request, I am enclosing a brief statement showing some of the accomplishments of the Division of Dry-Land Agriculture and how the evidence obtained by the Division of Dry-Land Agriculture at its stations has been and is now of benefit to other Government agencies.

Very truly yours,

E. C. AUCHTER, Chief of Bureau.

Bureau of Plant Industry—Dry-land agriculture

1940 ALLOTMENT

I. Reduction of $51,828 shown in Bureau of Budget estimate will affect the following stations as indicated:

A. Federally owned stations (discontinue all work, abandon owned land and buildings):
Oklahoma: Lawton (160 acres owned, 60 by permit).....	$9,250
Texas: Big Spring (130 acres owned).....	7,400
B. Federally owned station (Division of Irrigation Agriculture) (discontinue cooperative dry-land investigations):
South Dakota: Newell (360 acres federally owned).....	4,075
C. Federally operated, on leased land:
Wyoming: Sheridan (320 acres under indefinitely long lease).....	8,200
D. State substations (discontinue cooperative dry-land investigations):
Kansas:
Colby.....	3,475
Garden City (40 acres nominally leased to year 1963).....	3,000
Montana: Moccasin.....	3,350
North Dakota: Dickinson.....	4,375
Oregon: Pendleton.....	4,900
Wyoming: Archer.....	3,830

II. Further reduction of $75,000 shown in House committee report will affect the following additional stations as indicated:

A. Federally owned stations (discontinue all work, abandon owned land and buildings):
Colorado: Akron (66 acres owned, 320 acres leased to year 2030; 20 acres leased to year 2031).....	9,250
B. Federally owned station (Division of Irrigation Agriculture) (discontinue cooperation in dry-land agriculture):
Montana: Huntley (360 acres federally owned).....	4,800
C. Federally operated on leased land:
New Mexico: Tucumcari (481 acres leased to year 1999).....	8,300
Texas: Dalhart (160 acres leased to year 2007).....	8,350
D. State substations (discontinue cooperation in dry-land agriculture):
Kansas: Hays.....	5,450
Montana: Havre.....	3,925
Nebraska: North Platte.....	5,500

III. Total reduction of $126,828 will:

- Discontinue all work and abandon owned land and buildings at 3 federally owned stations.
- Discontinue all work at 3 federally operated stations.
- Discontinue cooperative work in dry-land agriculture at 2 Federal stations operated by the Division of Irrigation Agriculture.
- Discontinue cooperation in dry-land agriculture at 9 State substations.
- Leave only the two regional stations, one at Mandan, N. Dak., the other at Woodward, Okla. Even at these two stations the work will have to be curtailed.
- Seriously curtail all Washington services to dry-land agriculture investigations in the Great Plains.
- Discontinue services of 23 professional men, 5 clerical workers, 14 farm laborers, and 50 to 75 temporary laborers.

IV. Discontinuance of these field stations will mean that the facilities will no longer be available for cooperative investigations with other Divisions in this Bureau such as Cereal Crops and Diseases, Fruit and Vegetable Crops and Diseases, Forage Crops and Diseases, and with other Bureaus, such as Animal Industry, Dairy Industry, and Soil Conservation Service.

SOME RESEARCH ACCOMPLISHMENTS OBTAINED AT DRY-LAND AGRICULTURE STATIONS

1. Development of cultural methods and practices for the successful growing of grain and feed crops in dry-land areas.
2. Have determined methods for controlling soil erosion by wind and water in connection with successful cropping methods.
3. Have developed methods of determining in advance of seeding whether there is sufficient moisture in the soil to produce a satisfactory crop of wheat.
4. Have developed through breeding and selection practically all the present used varieties of sorghums in the dry-land areas which can be harvested with combines.
5. Have originated short-season drought-resistant varieties of tomatoes for the Great Plains area.
6. Have developed in cooperation with other divisions improved varieties of wheat adapted to the dry-land areas.
7. Have determined in cooperation with other agencies the most desirable varieties of small fruits and vegetables for the Great Plains area.
8. Have determined the value and best use of windbreaks for the protection of the home, livestock, and crop production.
9. Crested wheat grass, the most important cultivated pasture and forage grass in the northern Great Plains, was developed and introduced by the dry-land stations in cooperation with other agencies.

Many of the practices and policies developed in the dry-land areas by other agencies of the Government, such as the Soil Conservation Service, Farm Security Administration, Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and the Farm Credit Administration, are based at least in part on the research findings of dry-land agriculture. The Bureau of Plant Industry has been established for over 40 years and has been securing plant and soil data during all this time. Evidence was thus available in many cases to answer the questions which immediately confronted the newer action agencies when their work started. Since the start of these various agencies the Bureau has been and is being called upon to furnish accurate information on such things as:

- The crop-producing power of soil-types in different areas.
- The best crops and rotations to use for the most successful agriculture.
- The kinds of grasses, vines, or shrubs for use to prevent erosion.
- The producing value of land in relation to equitable loans.
- The best methods of range revegetation and grazing practices.
- The determination or classification of crops relative to their soil-depleting or soil-improving qualities.
- The determination of plants to be used and of methods to be followed in future management of lands abandoned for crop use.
- The determination of rates for crop insurance has been based upon the data accumulated in experiments conducted at the dry-land stations.
- The determination of the best shade trees and ornamental plants to plant and the best methods of planting them in the Great Plains area have been determined at these dry-land stations.

I know this House wants to be fair. After all, there are not many people living in the Great Plains area extending all the way from the Gulf of Mexico to Canada. We are, as far as votes are concerned, defenseless in this House; yet, so far as area and problems to be met are concerned we rank No. 1 in the Nation. Certainly this House cannot forget the dust that came from the Great Plains and settled even on the Capital. If you lived in that country and could view these field stations in operation, could see what they have accomplished in teaching the farmers and the ranchers how to resod that blowing land, how to terrace it, how to catch the water and bring back a stand of grass, how to grow trees, grapes, and fruit, the kind of sorghums to plant that will resist drought, in all, how to farm successfully on the plains, you would realize that to economize by cutting off this $126,000, to close those buildings and those lands, most of the land donated by States and individuals, would be to do a great injustice to the great expanse of territory that needs aid.

We find no reduction in cotton, tobacco, rice, and sugar investigations, for control of insects and pests. Everything that has a block of votes here in the East is well taken care of, but we from the semiarid country have to suffer by this cut. Certainly our people in this area deserve the great aid from the Federal Government these stations afford. The Great Plains area is the bread basket of the Nation. It provides a large portion of the livestock for the Nation. Certainly $226,000 is not too much to spend for the agricultural guidance of this great territory.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Does the gentleman know of any justification which has been suggested for abandoning these research laboratories?

Mr. FERGUSON. The only thing the committee said was that the States should assume the entire responsibility for maintaining these stations.

Mr. COOLEY. Has it been suggested that the activities of these laboratories might be transferred to the regional laboratories which are going to be established and opened soon?

Mr. FERGUSON. Certainly not. No such proposal has been made, to my knowledge.

Mr. COOLEY. In other words, the proposition is to abandon completely the work which has been done.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; completely to abandon the work. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] is recognized for 3½ minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, it will be impossible in 3½ minutes to add anything of importance to that which has been said in the splendid speeches that have been made upon this amendment. I simply want to call attention to the fact that three of these dry-land stations that would be eliminated if this cut is sustained, are in the district in Montana which I represent: One at Havre, which is State-owned and to which the Federal Government has been contributing about $4,000 per year to maintain; one is at Moccasin which the State owns and to which the Federal Government has been contributing in the neighborhood of $3,350 a year to maintain; and the third is at Huntley, in eastern Montana. This one is owned by the United States Government. The Federal Government bought the land, has leased the necessary land to carry on the experimental work in conjunction with the land it owns and has also constructed several very expensive buildings at Huntley. All of which as stated are owned by the Government. If you abandon this project now all of these buildings would go into a state of disrepair and the amounts heretofore expended by the United States Government would be entirely lost.

The people of that country living in an arid region of approximately 60,000,000 acres would be denied the splendid use that has been made of these dry-land experiment stations. They were established nearly 30 years ago and have made valuable contributions along agricultural studies of great benefit to the arid regions. I want to say to the Members that the Congress could not possibly in the light of the information that is given as to what these stations are doing and the purposes to which they are actually put, be against the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from Texas. I will enumerate some of the activities carried on at these stations: First, a study of the crop-producing power of soil types in different areas. Second, the best crops and rotations to use for the most successful agriculture. Third, the kind of grasses, vines or shrubs for use to prevent erosion. Fourth, the producing value of land in relation to equitable loans.

It fits in with every agency of the Government that has to do with carrying on loans, developing new sorts of grasses, insurance and all that sort of thing.

Again, the determination or classification of crops relative to their soil-depleting or soil-improving qualities.

The determination of plants to be used and of methods to be followed in future management of land abandoned for crop use.

The determination of rates for crop insurance has been based upon the data accumulated in experiments conducted at the dry-land stations.

The determination of the best shade trees and ornamental plants to plant and the best method of planting them in the Great Plains area have been determined at these dry-land stations. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to join the other members of the committee who have spoken in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. The House Committee on Appropriations was not unanimous in favoring all of these drastic cuts in this agriculture appropriation bill. As a member of that committee I opposed some of these cuts because I felt they were too drastic and because these cuts represented a direct attack on my agricultural district, where we need help now so badly. To me it represented a desertion of our farmyards. I am as anxious as any Member here to make reductions wherever that is possible. I am in favor of some of the reductions in this bill, but not in favor of all of them. The cut has been too deep and, in my opinion, too drastic, and, if allowed to remain, will cripple some of the good work which has been done.

I am for the retention of this item because I feel the work has helped the farmers in my district. I feel the continuation of this item will help our farmers who are faced with a plain statement from the Agriculture Department that they might as well go out of the corn-growing business and turn to the growing of a new kind of a crop. Drought has hit my district year after year. Of course, we pray that we will have rain and a good crop this year. We are not defeatists, and we appreciate the fact that the land in the Third District of Nebraska is about the richest land in the world. But we know now that a drought can come year after year, and that some grasses, sorghums, and grains will resist the drought. The people running these dry-land experimental stations can help our farmers in the growing of these new crops. So let that item stay in the bill and let these people help our farmers where help is needed right now. You see, we in Nebraska are up against some hard problems. We know how to raise corn. In my district we raise some of the best corn, grain, hogs, and cattle in the world; that is, when it rains on time and when there is no severe drought. Last year we raised only about 10 bushels of corn to the acre. Our neighbor, Iowa, raised 50 bushels to the acre. The Secretary of Agriculture tells me we have to raise some other kind of crops, some drought-resisting crops, such as sorghums. Some of our farmers know how to grow that, but maybe there are some things which these experts can suggest that is better, or they can suggest and help in making improvements. Our farmers do not want to leave that country. They know the richness of the land upon which they live. They know what it means to them if they have to be forced off the farms and go into the towns on relief or follow the crowds to the Pacific Northwest or California to take their chances on something new. They want to stay home. I feel the work of this particular branch of the Department will help them stay on their farms. It is going to rain again in my district and we are going to harvest good crops once more. The help this department will give us will just add to the strength and hope of the people who want to stay on the Nebraska farms. The amount to be spent is a drop in the bucket compared to what you are throwing into some appropriations for the Army and Navy.

The work of this department, connected with the work of the farm forestry and other meritorious programs in my district, will, in my opinion, eventually whip the drought and, in fact, will stop erosion, stop land blow-outs, and even dust storms. I appeared before the committee and asked for increased appropriations for the farm-forestry item and also the retention of the parity payments, but I want to stress the protective work that has already been accomplished by the farm-forestry people. With their work and the resodding of land by this particular department and the rest of the program in my State, we should see a great change there in the next few years. You should see some of the great trees which are now protecting our farms as a result of the work of the farm-forestry people.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Woodward station for years has been putting out trees. That station developed the Chinese elm and it has over 500 cooperators. It has had trees in production for the last 10 years.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma for his contribution. I hope that he will join me in my efforts to secure a permanent program for the farm forestry. It has proved itself so satisfactory to the farmers and all the people in my State that it should no longer depend upon uncertain funds and handouts from relief funds. It should have an independent and permanent set-up in the Department of Agriculture because there is no longer a question of the good it has accomplished and the great benefits we of Nebraska can expect from it in the future. We also are growing Chinese elm successfully in my district along with many other kinds of trees, such as the regular elm, cedar, wild plum, cottonwood, and, in fact, we have learned just what kind of trees will grow successfully in our particular kind of soil. Our trees are growing about 75 percent successfully on land where there have been no trees before. Trees planted in 1936 now are 20 and 30 feet in height and are already proving great refuges for wildlife, stopping winds and erosion, and eventually will provide wood for the farm woodlot. In fact, the farmers in my district feel that this is one of the best programs we have ever attempted.

Now, regarding the dry-land stations which I hope we will put back into this bill, I favor them now because I believe they will eventually show that the reduction philosophy of the Administration is absolutely wrong. I feel that they will eventually prove that the Secretary of Agriculture is wrong when he intimates that we in Nebraska should quit growing corn.

You know most of the farmers in my district have been successful in growing corn and hogs when climatic conditions have been good. In recent years, due to the drought, we have lost successive corn crops. We have participated in the soil-conservation program and the benefit payments are welcome. However, due to the fact that our corn crop has been a disappointment during several years past, many of our farmers have requested that I ask the Secretary of Agriculture to give some special attention to the drought areas. Many of the farmers in my district who participate in the program feel that perhaps States such as Iowa, where they raised an average of 50 bushels of corn to the acre last year, get somewhat of a preference over Nebraska where we raised an average of only 10 bushels of corn to the acre. Many of these farmers felt that the Secretary should have left our corn and grain acreage the same in 1940 as it was in 1939 until we caught up on our yield which we will eventually do. In reply to my request for some such concession the Secretary of Agriculture replied that Nebraska may have to turn away from the growing of corn and turn to drought-resisting crops, such as sorghums. The 1940 program having been made by the Department, nothing further could be done, so the farmers there must follow the program set up by the Department. However, I still am opposed to this philosophy and feel the farmers in the drought district should be given some special consideration in the acreage plantings until we catch up in our harvest yields.

All of this, of course, is beside the point, but it indicates that the dry-land stations can be of great benefit to the farmers in my district who are told by this high authority that they must turn to growing new and "other kind" of crops than they are normally familiar in growing.

In passing I wish to tell the Membership of the House of my appreciation of the new policies and new ruling of the Farm Credit Administration regarding Federal land-bank loans. I believe that these rulings will help many of the farmers in my district to stay on their farms. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take much time, but I would like to qualify as a witness on behalf of the pending amendment. I have lived on and west of the one-hundredth meridian and have farmed for more than 60 years. We have an agricultural station in my district at Akron, Colo. Three years ago I spent a day there. I saw barley growing that would yield 25 bushels to the acre, while on a plot alongside of that station there would not be returned the seed. I saw wheat that would make more than 15 bushels to the acre, while on an adjoining plot it was dead. I saw as fine trees, 12, 15, and 20 feet high, growing as you ever saw any place, while on farms adjoining, farms that had been abandoned, the trees were dead.

There were more green trees at the station in Akron, Colo., than there were on the 100,000 acres surrounding.

Mr. Chairman, there is such a thing as being penny-wise and pound-foolish. I am inclined to think this bill falls into that class. I am satisfied that the grains and the sorghums they have developed will be of benefit to the farmers. They have developed a sorghum at Akron that will mature 200 miles farther north. I am inclined to believe that the proposition of cutting out these experimental stations is being penny-wise and pound-foolish. It looks as if the sentiment here is unanimous to restore this cut, so I will not take much of your time. I do want you to know, however, that those stations are bringing back thousands of dollars for every dollar that is expended.

For the reasons set forth above, the amendment should be agreed to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, for more than 20 years I was a member of the board of regents of the Agricultural College of Oregon. During most of that time I was chairman of the committee having charge of the experimental stations, and I know much about that work. I spent days and weeks studying the problem. There is no question but what this restoration ought to be made.

We have one station at Pendleton, Oreg., that will be discontinued if the pending amendment is not agreed to. This station was put in there some years ago. As a matter of fact, I helped locate it. The city and the county furnished the buildings and the land. The State, county, and city have contributed something like $30,000. One of the objects of that station is to find some way of producing a different wheat than is produced in the Pacific Northwest. Mind you, the station at Pendleton is the only station west of the Rockies covered in this Dry Land Act. We want something different than the soft, white wheat that we now produce. That is a wheat that goes largely into the export trade. A few years ago there was a shortage on the wheat lands just east of the Rockies. We could have filled the want that existed at that time, but we did not have the right variety. Instead, the United States imported from Canada.

Our soft wheat went into export. The Government of the United States since I have been a Member of the Congress has paid more than $25,000,000 out of the Treasury for subsidies for shipping wheat out of the country, and these subsidies have largely gone into our northwestern country, getting rid of that soft wheat.

One of the things we must learn is how to produce on the dry land a milling wheat that could be used more generally in the United States. That is one of the objects of the Oregon station.

It is certainly a serious mistake to abandon these stations. This work has been going on in these dry-land stations for some years. It is the cumulative knowledge that is valuable and that should be handed on. To stop the work now and to abandon the buildings is the worst of economy. I am for balancing the Budget, and I am for raising the money we have to spend, but I am not for a reduction in this item. I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks on yesterday I mentioned briefly my objection to the proposal to eliminate these 17 agricultural dry-land experiment stations. I wish to point out at this time that this is not the first proposal of the Federal Budget to eliminate several of the dry-land experimental stations of the country. In 1937 and again in the 1939 bills, the Budget, for some unknown reason, eliminated or attempted to eliminate several of these stations. Heretofore when the Budget has made recommendations to eliminate some 7 of these stations members of the committee, especially those of us from districts where the stations are situated, have been permitted to appear before the committee and express our views and give testimony with reference to the advisability of retaining the stations. Today, however, we have the anomaly of this committee at one fell swoop eliminating the funds for some 17 stations, without even extending to Members of Congress the courtesy of appearing before the committee to express our opinions and our objections to such action.

Heretofore this House and this committee have overwhelmingly voted to support the stations. Just why the committee should eliminate this item of $226,000 for these dry-land stations is a problem we are unable to solve. Of course, the cost of maintaining all of these stations would not be enough to start to build one small battleship, yet within a few days one of the committees of the House will be in here asking us for one of the biggest peacetime navies in the history of this Republic. Parity to farmers, water facilities, and other important items to farmers have been entirely eliminated. Still others have been drastically reduced. This would indicate that the farmers of the country are going to have to bear the brunt of the construction of these battleships.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Committee is eliminating only $126,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes; it is only $126,000 for the one item for dry-land stations. If the original amount of $226,000 is restored, which I believe this Committee will do, the dry-land experiment stations will be able to continue the great work they have been doing for the several years in the past.

Yesterday I mentioned the dry-land station at Lawton, Okla., in the district I have the honor to represent in Congress. That particular station has been established for a quarter of a century. It was established by the Federal Government after much investigation and because of a serious demand for scientific information concerning dry-land farming. This particular station has perfected several drought-resistant grains—sorghums, kaffir corn, and white clover. Although the station was selected by the Government and is owned by the Government, it did not select the richest land it could find, yet year after year, in the face of the fact that we have had a terrible drought in that area, they have improved and perfected many splendid drought-resistant crops and have carried on scientific research that has been really worth while to the farmers of that section. The statement has been made that these stations are duplicating other services rendered by other Federal agencies. But they fail to tell us what other agencies are duplicating the experiments now being carried on so effectively by the various dry-land stations. The fact is, no other agency of Government could possibly do the same work. For example, the Big Springs, Tex., station, the closest to the Lawton, Okla., station on the south, is over 400 miles distant. The nearest station to Lawton on the north is at Woodward, Okla., in northwest Oklahoma. Different conditions prevail in all of these sections. So it is absurd to say that these stations are duplicating other agencies of the Federal Government. Such argument is simply begging the question.

May I express the hope that the committee will restore the full amount of $226,000, which will make it possible to retain each of the agricultural dry-land stations now in operation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, to show you how just and accurate the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] is in his statement about whether or not the committee was courteous in hearing Members, there are 130 pages of testimony by Members of Congress in the hearings. The gentleman should not make such a statement on the floor of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; not now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman has referred to me.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well; the gentleman can answer it in his own time.

First, let me tell you what the situation is with respect to this item. In the 1940 appropriation bill we provided for $226,000 for dry-land agriculture. When the Budget sent up its estimate for this year on this item the amount was $175,000. The Budget cut off $51,000. This is the Budget's language:

The decrease contemplates discontinuing cooperative dry-land crop investigations at six State substations in Montana, North Dakota, Wyoming, Kansas, Oregon, and South Dakota.

The committee elaborated on that cut and extended it further, and extended it substantially, to the extent of $75,000. Why? Let us look at the purposes of this appropriation. Regrassing: We are spending $300,000 on an item of forage crops in this bill for identic purposes. There is an item for $76,000 for botany in this bill—for that kind of purpose. Cooperative windbreak: We have over $400,000 in this bill for cooperative farm forestry. Do not let anybody beguile you as to how niggardly we have or have not been.

When all is said and done, there is, in this bill, over $6,800,000 for experiment stations, and over $3,500,000 for farm extension—almost $19,000,000 for agricultural research.

Speaking now to the gentleman from Oklahoma, here are the figures submitted by the Budget. What does Oklahoma get under extension work? Oklahoma gets $555,000 out of the Federal Treasury. What do they get under title I of the Bankhead-Jones Act? They get another $59,000. In proper proportion that is true of Kansas, Nebraska, and a great many other States that are getting money out of these basic funds for agricultural research. That covers the whole program of purposes described under dry-land agriculture.

So let nobody say to you that the Congress and the committee has not been generous in dealing generally with this kind of a program. There is $19,000,000 in the bill for experiment and for extension services, and then sundry other hundreds of thousands of dollars for identical functions.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. However, the gentleman does not contend that this item is a duplication of any of this other work? Is it not a separate and distinct service that is not rendered under any other appropriation?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am quite sure I can find for the gentleman duplications of work, particularly when it comes to the matter of trees mentioned by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON]. The Soil Conservation Service has nurseries all over the country. T. V. A. has nurseries; the Forest Service has nurseries; and they are doing all sorts of basic work in trees and in expending hundreds of thousands of dollars for that purpose, and I can find identic functions in other departments of Government that are duplications of the function represented by the dry-land agricultural program.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Was the gentleman's experiment-station item of $1,000,000 eliminated or reduced a single dollar?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will say, my good sir, I never raised my voice when the committee touched a single item in which I had any interest.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I do not blame the gentleman. If I am advised correctly, his own station was not disturbed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I am willing to take my medicine, but you are not.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was just wondering if there was any duplication in the research work that is to be done in Peoria stations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Those are devoted entirely to other purposes, as outlined in the Farm Act of 1938, but I can find you lots of duplications here; and speaking about a letter from the Department, I can go to the Director of this Service and get a letter asking for a restoration of this and other items. They will always send letters to get more money, and that is one of the troubles—the pressure and the impact of those down in the departments who are sending letters up here asking for more money and for restoration, when we ought to be thinking a little in terms of economy. Make no mistake about it. We are generous to the point of almost $20,000,000 for experimentation, for extension services, and for these other functions, many of which are identical with those that they propose to restore now. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I only want to call the attention of this body to the fact that, in my judgment, we are making the same mistake we made in 1936. In 1936, when we had been for a little more than 3 years on the upturn in the business of this country, we made the mistake of cutting our appropriations to less than $1,000,000,000. The result was the recession and almost panic of 1937. We are doing exactly that same thing this year. We are cutting the appropriations so much that we are going to be compelled to accept another recession during this fiscal year, and we ought to know enough to realize that, and we ought to stop it.

So far as the pending amendment for a small amount for these stations is concerned, there ought not to be any question about that at all, and I hope there is none. I am going to ask permission at a later date to address this body on a subject that I cannot discuss in 2 or 3 minutes' time, and that is to point out to the Congress of the United States and to the people of this country the mistake that the Congress is making along this entire line. When I do this I hope that the gentlemen who are thinking they are practicing economy when they are cutting these appropriations will find out they are practicing parsimony instead of economy, and there is a vast difference between the two; and I am here to talk for the business of this country and not for the throttling of it. I am here to talk for the agriculture of this country and not for the paralyzation of it, and the only way we can get that is to continue along the lines that brought us success, and go back to them and bring more success, and we ought to know that what the gentleman said at the beginning of this debate is true, that this whole thing is up to the gates of the farm and the doors of the factories, and the farmers and the factory people ought to stand together on it, and that would include all the interests of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. This entire subcommittee voted unanimously for this cut. We came back to Washington the first of December. We started hearings and went into this particular matter in detail, and, after exhaustive consideration the entire committee voted unanimously for this cut.

In the last few years the departments of the Government have been reaching out and growing like mushrooms. This is especially true of the Department of Agriculture and especially true of these dry-land operations. Its experiment stations have grown up all over the country, doing practically the same work under practically the same conditions. They are treading on each other's toes, studying dry-land farming. Do you know what they are studying? They are studying how to put the land back into native grasses, as explained by one of the last speakers on this amendment. Why, if they leave it alone, it will go back to native grasses.

Then what will they do with it? I asked that question of one of those gentlemen who appeared before the committee last year. He said, "We will plow it up and put it into wheat." They want the Federal Government to put it back into grass, and then they want to plow it up and put it into wheat—land which ought never have been put into wheat in the first place—land which never should have seen a plow. Then the duststorms came and they are back in Washington again for more money to put it back in native grass.

Now, be fair about this. The committee has not asked you to do anything they would not do themselves. I have an experiment station of my own that is being wiped out along with the rest in this section. There is an experiment station just across the fence from my farm. It runs right up to the gate on my farm where I live. I have taken my medicine along with the rest of you. All that would have been necessary would have been for me to have appealed to the committee of which I am a member, or to have joined the hue and cry with the rest of these members whose beloved stations are being liquidated, and my station would have continued to bloom and blossom as a rose beside my meager acres. So do not think, gentlemen, that you have been abused or discriminated against when the Government diverts this much-needed money to better purpose.

Mr. Chairman, when we cut this bill, every cut we made in it was for a definite reason. We cut it where money was being wasted. We cut it where the United States Government was not getting value received for the expenditure. We cut it where there was unpardonable and unjustifiable duplication. Then the minute we bring it up here, there is a cry of "Save the farmer! Save the farmer!"

Mr. Chairman, every dollar of this cut would be used to ruin the farmer. What the farmer needs is a fair price for his products. Not one penny of this money will be used, or can be used, to raise farm prices. If you gentlemen really want to help the farmer, see that the Committee on Agriculture brings in a bill that will give the farmer a fair wage for his labor. If the Committee on Agriculture, instead of organizing crusades to continue, year after year, the same "experiments" in a dozen different stations, will follow the splendid example of the Committee on Labor and bring in legislation to pay the farmer for his labor—when the Committee on Agriculture puts a floor under farm prices as the Committee on Labor has put a floor under union wages—when the Committee on Agriculture brings in a bill to give the farmer a fair-trade bill to stabilize farm prices as the fair-trade law stabilized retail prices, then we will have solved the farm problem, and you will never solve it until you do that or its equivalent. Not a penny of the money which they are seeking to pry out of the United States Treasury with this amendment will be spent for any purpose which, by any stretch of the imagination, will help farm prices. On the contrary, this money is to be spent to bolster agriculture on land which neither God nor Nature ever intended to be cultivated.

It is bait to lure farmers out into the dust bowls to cultivate perennially drought-stricken submarginal lands. And all they raise will add to the burdensome surplus which is depressing prices in every farm market in the Nation.

We already have too much land in cultivation. We are paying farmers all over the United States millions of dollars every year to reduce acreage, and here you want to add acreage and undo everything we are trying to do in the agricultural adjustment program. It just does not make sense.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I know there is an experiment station in the gentleman's district that is being cut out and he is trying to get it back in order to get votes. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, no. That is not it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I want to pass along some advice that Speaker Cannon gave a new Congressman who came to ask his advice. He came to see Uncle Joe and said, "Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back for at least one more term and I want you to tell me how to do it." The Speaker, who always took great interest in the younger Members, gave him some excellent advice, too lengthy to be repeated here—some of it couched in the lurid language for which he was noted. And among other things he said, "Now don't get the idea that coming back here depends on getting a lot of pork for your district." He said, "My experience is that some of the fellows who get the most pork for their districts go back home and get beaten in the election. That didn't beat them maybe but it didn't help." He said, "You go out there on the floor and vote for the interest of the whole country. Be a statesman instead of a politician and they will send you back here, never you worry."

These dry-land stations are not worth the money we are spending on them. They are doing what ought not to be done. But we are not putting them out of business by this cut. To every State in the Union we are giving $140,000 in this bill for this very purpose and $100,000 additional. They ought not to have that much. We are really giving them too much, but the committee wanted to be generous. I appeal to you to vote like statesmen. Stand by your committee who have spent months preparing this bill, and who now unanimously recommend the elimination of this needless and wasteful duplication—this inconsistent effort to sabotage the farm program by putting unneeded land into cultivation and piling up ruinous surpluses. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

All time has expired.

The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 100 and noes 88.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. CANNON of Missouri and Mr. JONES of Texas.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 106, noes 96.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, salaries and expenses, $12,795,000; and in addition thereto there are hereby appropriated all moneys received as contributions toward cooperative work under the provisions of section 1 of the act approved March 3, 1925 (16 U. S. C. 572), which funds shall be covered into the Treasury and constitute a part of the special funds provided by the act of June 30, 1914 (16 U. S. C. 498): Provided, That not to exceed $859,319 may be expended for departmental personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided further, That not to exceed $1,500 may be expended for the contribution of the United States to the cost of the office of the secretariat of the International Union of Forest Research Stations and of the Department of Timber Utilization of the Comité International du Bois.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I notice that this appropriation calls for the expenditure of $16,366,000. I rise to suggest the question whether we are really getting our money's worth out of this over $16,000,000 investment by the Forest Service section of the Department of Agriculture? I read an article in Fortune magazine a short time ago in which the amazing statement was made that we are importing approximately, if I recall the figures correctly, 76 percent of our wood pulp, or pulpwood, the material out of which we make the paper on which our daily and other newspapers are printed.

Up in my State, Minnesota, as you all know—most of you probably have hunted or fished up there—we have millions of acres of cut-over land, land that has been completely denuded of its original, rich forest growth. Many of these acres are owned by the Federal Government in the great Superior and Chippewa National Forests.

Many of the people in Minnesota are asking questions as to the practicability of the expenditure of these millions of dollars which we come down to Congress and appropriate every year. One of the questions that is being asked by them is: In view of the tremendous importation of wood pulp why does not the Federal Government through the Department of Agriculture or the Department of the Interior, whichever has charge of our forests and is endeavoring to develop our forest areas, or redevelop them, why does not the Federal Government under some arrangement start a program of having our C. C. C. boys go there, or of putting W. P. A. workers into these cut-over areas and reforest them, plant the spruce trees that produce this wood pulp that we are importing from Siberia, Scandinavia, and Canada in such large degree? This is something that would produce dollars and cents for us in a very few years. I understand it takes only from 12 to 30 years to develop such trees to production, depending on climatic and weather conditions.

I do not believe the general public objects to our spending necessary money for relief purposes or for the C. C. C., if we get something in return for the expenditure either in the way of rehabilitation of these boys, or tangible return for the money spent and profitable results from the work done by the W. P. A. workers.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. I may state to the gentleman from Minnesota that we visited the Madison Laboratory and were told by them that a program and method had been worked out to produce this pulp and paper in this country. I asked them why they did not do it now so we could get some return for the money we were expending through these laboratories and they replied that 75 percent of our newsprint comes from Canada duty-free. They said, "While you advocate the use of our own pulp for manufacturing newsprint, the newspapers of the country would not let it be done."

Let me state further to the gentleman that we produce in this country 5,700,000 tons of pulp, and we export outside of newsprint, outside of manufactured products, 2,300,000 tons of pulp. If we would do what the gentleman advocates, restore and preserve these resources for the people of his section—and we visited that section of the country, and I know the gentleman is telling the truth about conditions there—if we did what he advocated we would give employment and increased income to a very great many people in that section of our country.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the distinguished Member from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am in favor of the program advocated by my colleague, but in order for this program to be a success it seems to me it is absolutely necessary to have some protection for the domestic producers rather than to permit all this pulp produced by cheap labor in other countries to come in duty-free. Unless we give our own industry some protection, the gentleman's proposal would do very little good.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is in line with what I wanted to speak on during these 2 minutes. I have just obtained figures from the Department of Agriculture which show that in three States alone the cut-over land under public and private control and supervision amounts to 24,304,000 acres, in Minnesota to 8,786,000 acres. Think of it! In the State of Minnesota alone nearly 9,000,000 acres lying idle, crying for use. In Michigan 8,350,000 acres. Remember, now, this is cut-over denuded land, and in most cases it is probably not returning anything to either the State or Federal Government in the way of taxes or anything else in the way of production or values. In the State of Wisconsin they have 7,168,000 acres, and so on we might go through the Western States, the Northeastern States, and the Southern States, for all have been denuded of their forests and are now waiting for us to wave the magic wand which would bring them back to maximum usefulness, as intended by the All-Wise Creator.

Now, what are we doing about the situation—of a constructive nature? It seems to me the Members of Congress have a duty to perform in this matter, and we should insist that this public money, if we are going to appropriate and expend it in these tremendous sums, should be used in a constructive way. Let us insist that some of it be used to put these acres back to work. They are producing nothing today. If we cannot compete with this foreign importation just referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota by utilizing the acres which are not producing anything, which are absolutely worthless as they lie at present, acres that have been paying no taxes for years, by replanting them and with the help of Mother Nature letting them redevelop, I should be very surprised. We can do it or I am greatly mistaken. I think we can compete with this foreign labor, but, even if we could not, I contend it would be more satisfactory than the money, labor, and land waste now worrying us all. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FLANNERY: Page 42, line 23, strike out "$135,000" and insert "$170,000."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we have already passed the reading of that paragraph. We are now on page 43, line 12, and the Clerk is about to read the paragraph on "Forest-fire cooperation."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The gentleman is correct. The Clerk has completed the reading of the paragraph down to line 12, on page 43. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 42, line 23, in order to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLANNERY]?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, much as I regret to do so, I must object. However, I will withhold the point of order if the gentleman desires to speak on his amendment.

Mr. FLANNERY. The gentleman objects?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I object. I would be glad to have the gentleman discuss his amendment.

Mr. FLANNERY. Under the gentleman's objection, that would be fruitless?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is true.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the acquisition of forest lands under the provisions of the act approved March 1, 1911, as amended (16 U. S. C. 513-519, 521), under sound commercial title satisfactory to the Attorney General as provided in said act, including the transfer to the Office of the Solicitor of such funds for the employment by that office of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere as may be necessary in connection with the acquisition of such lands, $1,000,000: Provided, That not to exceed $80,000 of the sum appropriated in this paragraph may be expended for departmental personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 45, line 13, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$4,000,000."

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, $4,000,000 for this one service of the Federal Government, the acquisition of lands for national forests, the conservation of natural resources, this is a very small amount to ask, particularly so when we note that this service in the last few years has been greatly increased. The number of purchased units in the last few years has been increased to 87. Some of these are in Ohio, some in Indiana, some in Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa. These are just barely getting started. In Indiana 35,000 acres were purchased and these were scattered over some 7, 8, or 9 counties. This is true, as I understand it, in Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, and other States.

It is penny-wise and pound-foolish to start a program, get it under way, and then let it lapse. When we are conserving our resources so far as money is concerned, I cannot see why we cannot conserve some of our natural resources. I therefore ask the members of this Committee to join with me in appropriating this small amount of money—$4,000,000—to conserve our natural resources in the way of forests, which in turn will conserve water; it will conserve land; it will conserve fish, game, and fowl, as well as offer places of recreation, and create valuable assets to the Nation. Nothing would be of more real service to our Nation than the restoration of our forests. I hope the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations will join with me in asking the Members to appropriate the sum of $4,000,000 for this purpose.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, temporarily I shall have to object. We need more time than that. Cannot the gentleman amend his request to 25 minutes?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We are under the 5-minute rule and I trust the gentleman will take only 5 minutes.

Mr. CROWE. Can we not have 25 minutes?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes, 5 minutes to be reserved for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, while I am in favor of economy, and I believe I am favoring economy when I support this amendment, if I had been consulted, or if I had anything to say about the preparation of the pending amendment, I do not think I would have asked for the $3,000,000 increase. Before this discussion is over, after consulting with some of the gentlemen, I may offer an amendment to this amendment cutting it down somewhat. From the standpoint of real merit, and if we were not in the midst of a campaign for economy, an increase of $3,000,000 would not be too much. The President himself 3 or 4 years ago when he was on the giving side and when money was being distributed pretty freely in this country, asked for and received an appropriation of $30,000,000 for this work. This money was used very advantageously, as contrasted with money spent in many other places I know of. Later this was cut down to $10,000,000, which was a very great reduction. Last year it was cut down to $1,000,000 by the Appropriations Committee, but put back up to $3,000,000 in negotiations between the Senate and the House.

Mr. Chairman, the sum of $3,000,000 was found to be inadequate. I want to state to the new Members particularly something in reference to the Forest Service. I say without fear of contradiction that the Forest Service is one of the most genteel services in the Government, especially as it is conducted in Ohio. The situation may be different in other places, but in Ohio its record is very fine. It has opened up forest activities in Ohio that it would be little short of shameful to discontinue. There is no question about it. If these purchases are discontinued in Ohio, the Government is going to lose a lot of money it has put out, and it will crush down an activity that is not only wholesome but profitable. They purchase the cheapest land that nobody else will have and that nobody else can use, the land on the ridges. They take such land and set it to forest, and in doing so they give employment to the C. C. C. boys and other people. There is no question about it, it is going to develop into money. The Forest Service will tell you that my section of the country is the finest section in the United States for the growth of white oak, poplar, walnut, and timber of that kind. If some of you happen to live in sections that will not grow anything, I cannot help it, but since we live in such a splendid location for forest activities, you cannot blame me for advocating that the activities be continued.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. A moment ago the gentleman used the term "genteel," in saying that this is one of the most genteel services in the Government. I hope the gentleman does not mean that the Forest Service is a sort of 4-o'clock-in-the-afternoon-tea service, because in that regard I do not consider that the Forest Service is one of the most genteel services of the Government. I believe it is a he-man service. Those fellows roll up their sleeves and take off their coats and go out and do a man's job in a very essential part of the Government service.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution. I used the word "genteel" advisedly. I use it as it refers to one who has the attributes of a gentleman. I mean that in all its activities the Forest Service men know how to be gentlemen. I know the Forest Service has never indulged in some of the practices by way of getting money that some of the other departments have, and I know what I am talking about in that respect.

Mr. Chairman, I just want you to know that in your race for economy you ought not to go to work and cut down this Service 66⅔ percent, when there is many another service that has not been reduced more than 10 percent. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I suppose some of my Republican colleagues will smile, if they do not laugh aloud right now, when I say that I wholeheartedly support the amendment that has been offered. It is so seldom that I vote for any increase in appropriations. Constantly and consistently I have spoken and voted for economy. I agree with my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], that because of the cry for economy and the necessity for it the amount perhaps should not be increased $3,000,000, but certainly we should have more than $1,000,000 to carry on this very valuable work.

May I point out that this is not a pump-priming project, and it is not boondoggling money, either. I doubt if there is a dollar this Government spends that yields larger returns than the money that is spent for reforestation, because it not only replenishes our wasteland with timber but gives men honorable employment, aids in flood control, conserves the soil, and helps in a thousand and one ways. I do not believe any Member of this House will question that this agency has been honestly and efficiently administered. It has done its work well and has earned its hire. For these reasons, and because this really is an economic investment that will yield large dividends on the money spent, I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE] should be adopted.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Is this the program referred to on page 88 of the hearings? If so, the hearings state that part of the funds previously appropriated have not been spent because there was difficulty in clearing titles.

Mr. SHORT. Down in the Ozarks where I live we would like to have more money to buy some of the land that is in three forest units in my district. I will be honest and frank now and confess that I am vitally interested in this appropriation. I should like to see the amendment carry. It is so seldom, you know, that we down in the Ozarks ever get a dime from the Government that we do appreciate even the crumbs that might drop from the hands of a benevolent Government. I know the Democrats over here are going to vote with me and I am going to vote with them, because this should not be a party matter. The reforestation work was established years ago and has been carried on under both Republican and Democratic administrations. If we are wise, I believe we will adopt the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Indiana. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment, and I wish the amount of increase were larger. I do not know of any appropriation that would do more good than an appropriation to acquire forest land for prevention of ruthless destruction of ripe timber and insuring a permanent timber crop. I am in hopes that the Joint Committee on Forestry, when it submits its report in something like a month, will suggest some method by which a department in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will be authorized to lend money to the Forest Service so that lands can be bought in the necessary quantity and we can work out a real forest program in this country.

I presume there is $100,000,000 worth of distress timber lands in the United States. By this I mean timber lands held by owners who must cut all or sell. In my district alone, where the ponderosa pine predominates, I presume there is $5,000,000 worth of timber land at a low valuation, that owners have carried from 10 to 40 years on the tax rolls and are now forced to sell at any price, or to cut it and sacrifice it on an overloaded lumber market. This timber ought to belong to the Government of the United States and be carried in the cutting circles that now have mills. The ripe trees ought to be cut and the unripe trees should be kept.

The $4,000,000 asked for in the amendment is an extremely small sum of money in view of the tremendous work this commission is doing. I had one plant in my district that 2 years ago asked for $280,000 of the money we appropriated, and this money was applied to purchase distressed timber in that cutting circle. This mill is now running on a continuous cut, on a selective logging plant. Had we not had this Government money we could not have saved this forest for the generations to come. Now a permanent and prosperous town is built up on the sustained-yield plan of harvesting the ripe timber. No more ghost towns where the plan is in operation.

This amendment should be adopted and should be just a forerunner of a real forest law which I hope we may enact before this session adjourns so that the Forest Service may borrow money necessary to perpetuate our forests.

I hope the pending amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I hope it will not be necessary for the committee to enter into an extended defense of this particular item of the bill. We concede the importance of the acquisition of these lands. If we had an income in excess of our budget I think this committee would favor continuing the program, but at a time like this when we must retrench expenditures, and stay within the national income, if something has to be temporarily deferred, it should be the purchase of additional forest lands.

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I much regret that I do not have time to yield.

Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with an imperative farm problem. It is a problem which involves paying the farmer a price equal in buying power to that received by industry and labor. This appropriation could not have the slightest bearing upon that problem. On the contrary, it would complicate the situation, for with every acre of land we purchase we must provide an average appropriation of 10 cents an acre in each annual appropriation bill, as long as time stands, to take care of that land, and for every acre that we buy we must take into consideration the problem of deficiency in State, county, and municipality revenues, which will be deprived of taxes and income when these lands are deeded to the Government.

Mr. Chairman, this is an expenditure which could be dispensed with for the present and one which would add to the burdens of the Department without compensating advantages, and I trust the Committee will vote down the amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DUNN) there were—ayes 36, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal Highway Act approved November 9, 1921 (23 U. S. C. 23), including not to exceed $59,500 for departmental personal services in the District of Columbia, $7,500,000, which sum consists of the balance of the amount authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1940 and $500,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1941 by the act approved June 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 635), to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the rental, purchase, or construction of buildings necessary for the storage of equipment and supplies used for road and trail construction and maintenance, but the total cost of any such building purchased or constructed under this authorization shall not exceed $7,500.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of the coauthors of the agricultural appropriation bill, but I am not particularly proud of that fact.

I have the highest regard and respect for all my colleagues on the Subcommittee on Appropriations for Agriculture and Forestry, but I think we have made a great many mistakes. The chairman of this subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], is, in my opinion, one of the ablest men in this House, one of the hardest workers, and a real friend of the farmer. But I must take issue with him in the position he has taken in reference to forestry.

In his message of March 14, 1938, to Congress, President Roosevelt called attention to the fact that—

Forests are intimately tied into our whole social and economic life. Wages from forest industries—

He said—

support five to six million people each year. Forests give us building materials and thousands of other things in everyday use. Forest lands furnish food and shelter for much of our remaining game and healthful recreation for millions of our people. Forests help prevent erosion and floods. They conserve water and regulate its use for navigation, for power, for domestic use, and for irrigation. Woodlands occupy more acreage than any other crop on American farms and help support two and one-half million farm families * * *

By furnishing cordwood, fence posts, building materials, and supplemental cash incomes to them.

The forest problem is so serious, according to the President, as—

To cause alarm to the people of the United States and to its chosen representatives.

And yet, gentlemen, by these cuts we have crippled forestry in the United States instead of encouraging it. We have made these cuts despite the fact that forestry in the United States is one of the most important of all the Government's undertakings.

Forest reserves were first authorized by Congress in 1891. This was nearly 50 years ago. They were reserved then from public domain, which was largely in the West. In 1911 Congress authorized purchase of forest lands and adding them to national forests in order to protect the navigability of eastern, southern, and Lake States streams help prevent erosion and floods there and to help perpetuate the country's supply of timber. Today there are 158 national forests in 36 separate States, Alaska, and Puerto Rico. They are located on the flanks of the Appalachians from New Hampshire to Georgia, around the Great Lakes and headwaters of rivers like the Mississippi and Missouri, on the Great Smokies, in southern pineries, and—between Canada and Mexico—on the slopes of the Rocky, the Cascade, the Sierra Nevada, and the coast ranges.

In the fiscal year 1931 the national forests included some 185,251,000 acres gross. They now include approximately 227,561,000 acres, of which 175,843,400 acres are Government land administered on the multiple-use principle by the Forest Service, which, as you know, is a bureau of the Department of Agriculture. Under pay permits these national forests now provide summer forage for more than six and one-half million cattle, horses, and sheep owned by more than 26,000 farmers, ranchers, and stockmen. Almost one and one-fourth billion feet of timber was harvested and used in the fiscal year 1931. The estimate for 1940 is one and three-fourths billion feet, a 43-percent increase in timber use that will involve some 22,000 individual transactions.

In 1931 there were 8,000,000 people who used the national forests for camping and other forms of recreation; in 1939 the number exceeded 20,000,000. In 1931 there were 8,466 fires on national forests. Last fiscal year there were 13,540. One lightning storm last year set 210 of these fires in northern California and southern Oregon. One of these fires was in such rough and rugged country that, even with modern organization and prompt delivery by airplane of more than 112 tons of supplies and equipment, this fire burned 34,000 acres and had to be fought for 26 days before it was put out.

In the face of such increased use, and of such increased danger by fire, this subcommittee now recommends some $2,000,000 less for national-forest protection and administration than was made available by Congress in 1931, and a cut of two and one-half million dollars under this year's Bureau of the Budget figure for roads and trails.

Yet, since they were first put under administration the national forests have not only helped prevent erosion and floods but they have returned more than $125,000,000 in receipts to the Federal Treasury, and for decades 25 percent of national-forest receipts have been returned to local governments in lieu of taxes.

The national forests also act as reservoirs of work. They provided 13,436 man-years of it through the W. P. A.—largely local labor—last year. Timber operations furnished an equivalent of 2,600,000 man-days of work. Owners employed some 25,000 riders and herders to care for livestock grazed under permit. Besides its permanent force of some 5,500 people the Forest Service hires more than 11,000 short-term employees—again mostly local people—during most years. In all, nearly 4,000,000 local people are supported in whole or in part through the national forests, which also provided, last year, year-long work and supervised training for some 50,000 C. C. C. boys.

In addition to responsibilities with respect to dependent families and communities inside the national forests, the Forest Service is custodian, for the Department of Agriculture, of 67 projects—many of them in the South—on which human rehabilitation "in place" is made possible through forest rehabilitation. With the appropriation cuts recommended by this subcommittee, much of this rehabilitation work will be jeopardized and the 11,000 local short-term men previously mentioned—many of whom are fire lookouts and fire guards—will have to be materially reduced.

Forest administration and management, on which families, communities, and social and economic structures depend, is faced with a huge task of reconstructing and utilizing forest resources. This cannot effectively be done except with a firm foundation of research, which helps farm and other forest owners in many ways. It provides markets, for example, largely through work of the Forest Products Laboratory. It helps the processor of forest products by pointing out ways to reduce waste and improve methods of manufacture. It helps the ultimate consumer of forest products through lower costs and improved services.

Forest research is vital to the housing problem, both urban and rural, to our plywood industry in the Northwest, to the control of stream pollution from pulp mills in the Lake States and elsewhere. And it points the way to new jobs for the jobless. Yet in our zeal for economy this subcommittee has reduced research items for the Forest Service by some $117,000 below the current appropriation, and $50,000 below what was recommended by the Bureau of the Budget.

Not long ago the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER], spoke of having seen 52 pages in a newspaper, advertising tax-delinquent land. I know that in Oregon and Washington forest lands forfeited for unpaid taxes totaled more than 1,850,000 acres in 1938, and that forest land tax delinquent for 3 years and more totaled some 5,370,000 acres. I am told that tax delinquencies of cut-over forest lands in 3 Lake States rose from 6,000,000 acres in 1929 to more than 20,000,000 acres in 1939.

The Congress in the past has helped relieve human distress on such lands as these by providing for national forest acquisition. Yet, gentlemen, funds in this bill for the purchase of forest lands are $2,000,000 less than the amount the Forest Service received for this purpose last year, and year before last. And fire-hazard reduction on the White Mountain National Forest—a forest that was hit by the New England hurricane—is also jeopardized.

Mr. Chairman I repeat that, in my considered opinion, this committee—of which I am a member—has made mistakes with respect to forestry items in this bill. I doubt very much if it is wise economy to cut a few dollars here, and leave a resource worth billions subject to such hazards as I have mentioned. Even in our sudden drive for a balanced Budget and in our enthusiasm for economy, I doubt if we should be so short-sighted as to virtually threaten one of the most essential resources we have in this Nation.

And that, gentlemen, is what this bill is doing.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

NATIONAL FORESTS—A BUSINESS PROPOSITION

Mr. Chairman, I recognize the futility of offering an amendment at this time to increase any of the items under the general heading of the Forest Service. But I am anxious that the membership of this House shall not look upon appropriations for the Forest Service as all expense with nothing coming in. For that simply is not the truth. The gentleman from Washington has already pointed out that our forest revenues now exceed $5,000,000 a year, and they are bound to increase from year to year.

In the national forest which has its headquarters in my home town, the Harney National Forest, the annual receipts consistently exceed the expenditures. That is true in many other forests, and is increasingly true as the Forest Service is able to establish its program of sustained yields.

Not only that, but if a balance sheet were to be made, showing an inventory of the value of our national forests at the time they have been acquired and an inventory of their present values, with a subtraction for any difference in expenditures and receipts, my conviction is that the balance would already show a tremendous profit. And this does not count the recreational and social values to the Nation in conserving these resources for enjoyment today and tomorrow.

Something of the meaning of forest values was brought home to me last fall when in another forest we had a terrible fire that destroyed 22,000 acres of timber and burned the very face of the earth. Appraisers have placed the economic loss at $500,000,000, a tremendous figure to contemplate.

Had it not been for the controls that were established, the fire would have traveled for days under the dry conditions that prevailed. Instead of 22,000, we could have had 800,000 acres of forest destroyed. That is the consoling thought—but it is also true that, had there been proper advance warning of the adverse atmospheric conditions which let the fire crown even at night, some of that $500,000,000 loss might have been avoided.

The national forests are a national asset, must be cared for properly to avoid loss, and, cared for properly, will yield dividends for all time to come. It is a business proposition.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply interested in this item of forest roads and trails. You, as the people of the United States, own some 1,200 square miles of national forests in my district. That national forest is not productive of anything except the joy and pleasure of the people who may come to it, because there is no timber in it.

However, that forest lies on mountainsides that run as high as five and ten thousand feet. The forestry growth that is there protects that watershed from sloughing off into the valleys below. There are 400,000 people in my district living below that watershed and subject to the sloughing off of soil and even great boulders whenever there is a fire which burns away the vegetable growth that holds it in place. The rains that follow in the wintertime carry that material down to cover the land below.

The appropriation for forest roads and trails is being reduced from $10,000,000 to $7,500,000. These roads are badly needed to enable forest fire-fighting equipment to quickly reach the scene of incipient holocausts. I recognize, too, the need for economy in the Federal Government, but I deeply deplore the fact that it has appeared advisable to the committee to choose this item to slash. Because I realize that there is no disposition on the part of the membership to restore such items as this and that therefore there is little sense in taking the time of the House in offering an amendment, I reluctantly refrain from doing so. There are not enough interested Members present to carry it. I realize that I would be fighting almost alone.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Agricultural engineering investigations: For investigations, experiments, and demonstrations involving the application of engineering principles to agriculture for the investigation, development, experimental demonstration, for investigating and reporting upon the different kinds of farm power and appliances; upon farm domestic water supply and sewage disposal, upon the design and construction of farm buildings and their appurtenances and of buildings for processing and storing farm products; upon farm power and mechanical farm equipment and rural electrification; upon the engineering problems relating to the processing, transportation, and storage of perishable and other agricultural products; and upon the engineering problems involved in adapting physical characteristics of farm land to the use of modern farm machinery; for investigations of cotton ginning under the act approved April 19, 1930 (7 U. S. C., 424, 425); for giving expert advice and assistance in agricultural and chemical engineering; for collating, reporting, and illustrating the results of investigations and preparing, publishing, and distributing bulletins, plans, and reports, $294,469.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BULWINKLE: On page 48, after line 22, after the word "demonstration", in line 21, insert "and application of methods for the prevention and control of dust explosions and fires during the harvesting, handling, milling, processing, fumigating, and storing of agricultural products, and of other dust explosions and resulting fires not otherwise provided for, including fires in grain mills and elevators, cotton gins, cotton-oil mills, and other structures; the heating, charring, and ignition of agricultural products; fires on farms and in rural communities and other explosions and fires in connection with farm and agricultural operations."

On page 49, line 13, strike out "$294,469" and insert "$324,469."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COLE of Maryland). The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from North Carolina on the point of order.

Mr. BULWINKLE. At the moment I can say nothing further than that for some 20 years this language has been carried in each appropriation bill. It is my impression that it is in existing law, but if the gentleman from New York knows and says that it is not, then I can do nothing further about it at the present time.

Mr. TABER. That is my understanding.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I have ascertained through consultation with the gentleman from Missouri, chairman of the subcommittee, that it is authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] desire to be heard?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, as the Chair is aware, it is the invariable rule that when a point of order is raised against an amendment to a bill the burden of proof of the admissibility of the amendment rests upon the proponent of the amendment.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That may be so, Mr. Chairman, but I state upon my word that the gentleman from Missouri just told me that authority for this language is to be found in existing law. I took his word for it. I cannot, however, cite the particular statute at this time. I ask the gentleman from Missouri now if authority for this language is to be found in existing law.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If my good friend, the gentleman from North Carolina, submits that as a personal question, I must concede that it is authorized under the basic act establishing the Department.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman please give me the citation.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Title V, section 511, of the United States Code. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York care to be heard further on the point of order?

Mr. TABER. The burden of proof, Mr. Chairman, is upon the proponent of the amendment.

My understanding is that the basic law does not go far enough to sustain this language, and there have never been any specific legislation authorizing it. I have not the statute in front of me and am speaking only from recollection, but it is my recollection that the basic law does not go far enough to sustain this elaborate authorization carried in the amendment.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that it is nearly 2 o'clock, that I understand that at 2 o'clock anniversary services on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Supreme Court are to be held. I would not want to delay these services. I suggest that this matter could be looked up during the time the services are being held.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule, and this being so, the Chair believes the gentleman from North Carolina would prefer to have the matter disposed of at this time.

The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment which has been read, and against this amendment the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] makes the point of order that it is not authorized by law. Title V of the organic law establishes the Department of Agriculture, and in section 511 is found this language:

There shall be at the seat of Government a Department of Agriculture the general design and purpose of which shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture.

Without further reading of the organic law to which the Chair has referred, the Chair is of opinion that the amendment is clearly within the scope of the law.

The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina, without losing any of his rights, yield at this time in order that the Committee may rise—rise in accordance with a program previously agreed upon?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise, for the purpose of affording the House of Representatives an opportunity to hold exercises in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Supreme Court of the United States; and pending that motion, I may say, Mr. Chairman, that at the conclusion of the exercises, at approximately 3 o'clock, the Committee will resume its session and continue consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COLE of Maryland, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8202, the agricultural appropriation bill, 1941, had come to no resolution thereon.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FIRST MEETING OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER. Members of the House of Representatives, as you are doubtless aware, this is the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the first convening of the Supreme Court of the United States. I understand that appropriate ceremonies befitting this anniversary have already been held in the building of the Supreme Court of the United States; however, it was thought entirely fitting and proper, inasmuch as that great Court very kindly joined the House of Representatives and the Senate some weeks ago in celebrating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the convening of the first Congress of the United States that some notice should be taken of today's important historic event by the House of Representatives. Two Members of the House have kindly agreed to deliver addresses appropriate for the occasion.

It gives me very great pleasure to present to the House of Representatives the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. GUYER. [Applause.]

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, first permit me to say that I deem it a distinguished honor to appear on this program with the beloved chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Texas, Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, whose greatness of heart, mind, and legal attainments eminently qualify him for a seat on the illustrious Court whose sesquicentennial we celebrate today. [Applause.]

On the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the first session of the Supreme Court of the United States we naturally turn to the Convention which created not only the Supreme Court but also the Government of our beloved country.

The men who assembled in Philadelphia on Friday, the 25th of May 1787, to write down upon parchment for the first time a scheme for a government for the preservation and evolution of liberty had the most overwhelming task ever placed before a group of men since the morning stars sang together, and, judged by the work they wrought, were the greatest and wisest assembly of men that ever surrounded the council tables of any nation in all the tide of time. Their wisdom is patently illustrated by the obvious fact that these wise men seemed to know more then, even about so simple a matter as the proper time to convene the Congress, than we did after 150 years of experience. The so-called "lame duck" amendment lacked a single virtue or advantage while its faults are legion—an amendment induced by the urge and itch to change the Constitution as often as possible in spite of the sage admonition of Washington concerning the "spirit of innovation."

In 1858, Abraham Lincoln, with characteristic lucidity, stated the problem that confronted these devoted patriots when he declared: "It has long been a grave question whether any government, not too strong for the liberties of the people, can be strong enough to maintain itself in a great emergency." Through that long, hot, dusty summer of 1787, that devoted company of patriots struggled to find an answer to the grave question expressed long after by Abraham Lincoln in the gathering storm clouds that enveloped him in the years just prior to 1861. On September 17, when they were ready to sign the proposed Constitution, they had created a government which was to prove not too strong even to trample upon the rights of a slave with shackles on arms and ankles, yet strong enough to maintain itself in the face of the greatest emergency that ever confronted a republic in the history of the earth.

You have seen the milky way, that mysterious belt of light flung like a silver mantle across the shoulder of night.

What is the milky way? Uncounted millions of stars larger and brighter than our sun yet so far away that their light comes to us only in those broken and shattered fragments that leave that romantic trail of light out yonder on the far horizon of the universe. All that staggering vastness of the universe, in which our earth is but a speck of dust, is held together and in perfect harmony by two forces. One pulls toward the center, the other away from it. One is centripetal, the other centrifugal.

In government there are two corresponding forces. One pulls toward the center, the other away from it. One is centripetal and the other centrifugal. One tends toward order, the other toward chaos. One toward organization, the other toward disintegration. One toward despotism and the other toward anarchy.

The task of our fathers at Philadelphia was to devise a government in which the centripetal and the centrifugal forces would be so balanced that there could be neither despotism nor anarchy, balanced so nicely like the stars and planets in the palm of the Almighty that we can predict for years in advance when there will be an eclipse of the sun or moon. The men who framed our Constitution were familiar with the history of the ages and their philosophies from Plato to Adam Smith, whose "Wealth of Nations" had just before reached America.

The stories of Babylon and Egypt, of Greece and Rome, were commonplace with them. The records of the past were searched for the dangers that would lurk in the path of a government for free men. But when these patriots had done all they could, when they had formed a plan of government with a written constitution, they had only the blueprints of a government—a skeleton without flesh and blood or the breath of life. Out of that noble plan must be evolved a government with arteries and veins, with flesh and blood—a living government. And that is just what has happened in these 150 years. Along with the other departments of the government, our judicial system with the Supreme Court as its head developed and rendered this a government of laws and not of men. The Supreme Court that John Jay found on the first day of February 1790 was without form and void. It too, like the whole scheme of our government, must develop and evolve under the Constitution and ever according to the spirit and the letter of that Constitution.

The struggle of the Supreme Court to secure its integrity is one of the most intriguing romances of the political history of the United States. The Supreme Court, in the second decade of our national life, became the center of a raging tempest of party passion not exceeded in our history. At that time the President of the United States demanded that a judge should be expelled from the Court by the request of the two houses of Congress, impatient of the process of impeachment provided by a wise Constitution. This demand by the President was in wide contrast to President Jefferson's ringing statement concerning the formation of the Commonwealth of Virginia. In his "Notes on Virginia" he declared:

The concentrating of these (the executive, legislative and judicial powers) in the same hand is precisely the definition of despotic government. An elective despotism was not the government we fought for; but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among the several bodies of magistrates, as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason that convention which passed the ordinance of government laid the foundation on this basis, that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at a time.

That was a noble statement of the whole theory of a free government where no man would ever be permitted to trample on the rights of another be he executive, legislator, or judge. It provided a government of checks and balances in which no department could rule alone. If the executive became tyrannical the Court could call a sudden halt. If the legislature transcended the authority of the Constitution in its laws the Court could interfere. If the judge became corrupt or brought reproach upon the judiciary he could be impeached.

A half century before the Constitution was written, Montesquieu, whom Madison termed the "Oracle of Liberty," discovered this principle of free government when he declared:

There can be no liberty when the legislative and the executive powers are united in the same person or body of magistrates because apprehension may arise lest the monarch or the senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner.

That, coupled with Aristotle's vague suggestion of three agencies or departments of government, was the germ of the idea that led the makers of the Constitution of Virginia, and afterward of the Constitution of the United States, to adopt the system with three independent departments, and I am sure that if Thomas Jefferson had been present when our Constitution of the United States was framed, he would have been most insistent upon adopting that kind of a government, even if, when President, he contemplated the impeachment of all the judges of the Supreme Court, including his illustrious cousin, John Marshall, in direct opposition to the theory of an independent judiciary. Thomas Jefferson was human and he permitted his partisan enthusiasm to overcome his fundamental principle of three independent departments of government. Anyway, we can forgive him, because he ignominiously failed to break the power of the Supreme Court, which John Marshall had galvanized into the greatest tribunal of justice that ever existed on earth. And because, too, that every time that illustrious Court has been assailed, and the storms of vituperation and passion have spent themselves, that Court always has emerged stronger than ever before.

Those victories were all the more satisfactory because the Court viewed the storm with characteristic silence, and without "purse or sword," employing no promoter of propaganda, no hired press agents to circularize the Nation, no largess of the people's money to dole out to purchase the public favor, no bureau of defamation to answer the assaults of demagogues, and no defense except the devotion of the people, whose rights and liberties it has sheltered and enshrined. Amid all the vindictive storm of passion and political wrath it has remained the most majestic tribunal on earth.

In that 150 years great judges have upheld the record of the Court of John Marshall and Roger B. Taney, whose combined services covered 63 years and helped to construct this majestic tribunal; but all of them could not have wrought this work and built this mighty Court alone. Back behind them at the Nation's firesides the fathers and mothers helped with their support and prayers to build its majesty—to buttress it with the resistless power and invincible strength of public opinion.

Who else built it? The pioneer out on the fringe of the desert, the pioneer out on the Santa Fe and the Oregon Trails, the most romantic trails that ever mapped the frontiers of the earth or that ever blazed the path of empire. They built it in the campfires where danger haunted their bivouac. They built it in the fields, where disappointment mocked and where gaunt famine stalked. They built it in the little red schoolhouses where the children loved their books. The soldiers built it on a hundred battlefields when they died for liberty. The mothers at the hearthstones and at the cradles built it, built it in the fathomless blue of their babies' eyes. They built it in the churches where they gathered to worship their God. John Marshall and Joseph Story built it; William Howard Taft and Charles Evans Hughes built it; Washington and Madison built it; Hamilton and Jefferson built it; Lincoln and Douglas built it; Grant and Lee built it. Victor and vanquished built it. [Applause.] Nobody was always right, but right always triumphed in the end. They all helped to build it in love of country and mankind. May God bless all who aided in shaping its stately form and its mighty destiny.

For a century and a half it has compelled the admiration of all the people of the earth as a symbol of virtue and righteousness. For there was never a time in the history of the earth, since amid the splintered lightnings of Sinai, when the beginning of all law came direct from the lips of God Himself, when the rights of the poor and the needy, the weak and the downtrodden, were guarded with more energy and girded about with more jealous care. Thanks to our judicial system, with this illustrious Court at its head. Let no impious hand profane its record or threaten its integrity. We did not build it for today nor for tomorrow; we built it for the centuries. We commit it to the future. Its past is secure. Here may innocence always find sanctuary. Here may the weak ever find refuge. Here may law and order reign. Here may the Constitution be revered. Here may tolerance and fraternity be held sacred. Here may generations yet unborn realize their hopes and ambitions. Here may it stand like the steadfast souls of John Marshall and his fellow jurists, untarnished and unblemished by sordid avarice or unholy ambition, unshaken by weakness or fear, independent and incorruptible, let it stand like adamant for all the centuries to come, for without all this its majesty is but mockery, its strength is sand, for when—

The tumult and the shouting dies,
The captains and the kings depart;
Still stands thine ancient sacrifice,
An humble and a contrite heart.
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget.

"God save the United States of America and this honorable Court."

[Applause, the Members rising.]

The SPEAKER. I now have the distinguished honor of presenting the able and beloved chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary, the Honorable HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Texas. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, and Members of the House of Representatives, first, may I express my very great appreciation for the generous remarks of my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. GUYER], to whom you have just listened. I appreciate, as I know you do, the very eloquent address which we have just heard.

I want to speak to you on this occasion in a very plain, practical sort of way; on this, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of the Supreme Court, I want to give you, if I can, the picture of our constitutional development, the place which the Supreme Court holds in that scheme, and particularly the responsibility that rests upon you and me in this the one hundred and fiftieth year after the inauguration of the last of the three great departments which constitute the functioning machinery of this Government. The first President had been elected, of course; the first Congress had convened on March 4 of the preceding year. On the next day after Congress convened a Committee on the Judiciary was appointed. The Judiciary Act was approved by Washington on September 24, 1789. John Jay, of New York, was nominated to be Chief Justice; Rutledge, of South Carolina; Cushing, of Massachusetts; Harrison, of Maryland; Wilson, of Pennsylvania; and Blair, of Virginia, to be Associate Justices. Harrison declined to serve and James Iredell, of North Carolina, was appointed in his stead. Thus was inaugurated the last of the three departments of the Federal Government. It was an independent judiciary. The independence of the judiciary had been secured by two provisions of the Federal Constitution. One is that "Judges shall hold their office during good behavior," the other provides that they "Shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

ORIGIN OF INDEPENDENCE OF JUDICIARY

The notion of an independent judiciary did not originate with the Federal Constitutional Convention, however; the origin and evolution of the chief of these provisions securing the independence of the judiciary is typical of most of the provisions in our written constitutional structure. They each originated in necessity and practically all of them had been tested by experience for a long time before the beginning of our independent governmental existence.

For a long time prior to the coming of William and Mary to the British throne there had been much complaint and bitter resentment over the fact that the Kings of England, who appointed the judges, and especially during the regime of the Stuarts, either directly or indirectly controlled their judgments. Public opinion condemned that practice and public purpose set about its correction. In the Acts of Settlement of the Succession with William and Mary in 1701 it was provided that judges "shall hold office as long as they behave themselves well." This provision originated out of the necessity to correct a definite, well-recognized maladjustment of the machinery of government. But it did not complete the correction. Later it was discovered that the tenure of the judges terminated with the demise of the King. So, when George III came to the throne some 59 years afterward in 1760, to correct that condition, it was provided, as one of the first, if not the first act, of his reign, that judges should hold office as long as they behaved themselves well, notwithstanding the demise of the King.

As indicating the trend of constitutional development on that side of the Atlantic, moving power away from its centralization in the King, later on, in the reign of King George it became an axiom of the British Constitution that in the event of a disagreement between the Parliament and the King, any appeal taken to the people through the medium of an election should be made by the ministry and not by the King. This was consummated 5 or 6 years after the adoption of our Federal Constitution. Internally they were decentralizing. They had long been a nation. Internally we were centralizing; we had not yet become a nation. In order to have the whole picture of those times it is well to have in mind that there were then approximately half as many people in the Colonies as in England, in round numbers 8,000,000 people in England and 4,000,000 on this side of the Atlantic.

CONSTITUTION DEVELOPING ON BOTH SIDES OF THE ATLANTIC

During the period of colonization, while we were bargaining with the British Crown, it to induce us to emigrate to America and we, for sufficient privileges and liberties to induce us to emigrate, and were writing the resultant negotiations into the terms of the royal charters of the Colonies, things equally as important bearing directly upon our own constitutional structure and the place of our Supreme Court in our structure of government were taking place on the other side. Our own Constitution was being shaped at the same time on both sides of the Atlantic. As we have seen, the independence of the Court which we inaugurated 150 years ago was fixed in our Constitution by our ancestors in 1701 in the Acts of Settlement.

At the time this provision of the Constitution, establishing the independence of the judiciary, was being presented to, and accepted by William and Mary, there was also presented to them the Bill of Rights, which was accepted. It contained the following provisions which were later incorporated into our written constitutional structure:

That levying money for or to the use of the crown, by pretense or prerogative, without grant of parliament, for longer time or in other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of parliament, is against law. That elections of members of parliament ought to be free. That the freedom of speech, and debates or procedure in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. That jurors ought to be duly empanelled and returned and jurors which pass upon men in trials for high treason ought to be freeholders. That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons before conviction are illegal and void. And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, the strengthening, and preserving of the laws, parliament ought to be held frequently. And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties.

ORIGIN OF CONSTITUTION

If I could do only one thing in America, I would have it understood, and it is the truth, that while the men who met in the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia were great men, they did not create the Constitution of this Government. I want to emphasize that. The Constitution of this Government has a higher authority than the words of men to support it. It came from a source higher than the source of any convention.

Your Constitution and mine existed in the very nature of things before there was any positive precept. It is perfectly evident when you examine life that the Almighty God intended that men should be free. I want you to think about that a minute. In God Almighty's economy He does not attempt to protect human beings against difficulties. In fact, He creates difficulties. The difficulties which we experience in operating a system of free government constitute a part of the gymnastic paraphernalia provided by God Almighty for the development of people. The development of people is the central objective of Nature.

The love for liberty, the ambition to be free, the aspiration to be free, have not been given to us in order that we may merely enjoy the blessings of liberty but in order that we first may struggle to be free and gain strength by the struggle; second, that we may discharge the duties incident to freedom and gain strength by their discharge. That is the plan which God Almighty has intended. That is our plan. It is susceptible of proof. It could be proven before any jury on earth. Therein lies the security of our Constitution and the certainty that it cannot successfully be attacked by those whom we call the "reds" if we but understand it and do not forget that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Its provisions did not come from the speculations of political philosophers or the deliberations of conventions. They originated out of necessity and they were tried by experience among a people peculiarly gifted with the genius for self-government before we ever came to the responsibility of writing our State and Federal Constitutions. Therefore, our Constitution has supporting it human authority, the men who met in conventions, and in addition to that it is supported by the fact that it has stood the test of the ages.

It is not something that just came from the creative genius of some men, although human beings have helped.

The notion of a fundamental, natural law, supreme and dominant in the social and governmental relations of men, had taken firm root in the philosophy of thinkers as far back as Aristotle. Perhaps men have held to that conviction as far back as men have observed correctly and thought clearly and analytically. Cicero distinguished between summa lex, which existed according to his philosophy always before governments or written law, and lex scripta, written laws of man's making, which were to be regarded as void if they were contrary to the laws of nature.

In the Middle Ages such great jurists as Baden of France and Suarez of Spain agreed with these views but went further and held that God had planted a consciousness of these laws in the mind and conscience of man, from which one's understanding of natural rights was derived, and held further that a statute which was contrary to natural justice was ipso facto void. Grotius was in general agreement with this philosophy. Coke, Fortescue, and Blackstone agreed. Blackstone held, however, that there was no power to prevent Parliament from violating the supreme law. However, he did not go so far as some of our American commentators have gone who say that the Constitution is what the Supreme Court says it is or so far as some of the commentators on the British Constitution go who say that the British Constitution may be changed by the British Parliament. Neither of these statements is correct.

VITALITY OF CONSTITUTIONS

There is no power to prevent the British Parliament from enacting a law contrary to the British Constitution but that violation of the British Constitution does not change the constitution. It is true there is no power to prevent an ignorant or venal supreme court, if there should come to be such a court, from falsely interpreting or falsely applying the provisions of the constitution but the constitution would remain unchanged. We should merely have to await a happier day when the powers which had been abused and the trusts which had been betrayed should pass to fitter hands.

On both sides of the Atlantic, but chiefly on the other side, due to its longer history, the history of this people is replete with the record of great occasions and great achievements when the people, who had for a time been negligent, have aroused themselves and rescued their constitution and revitalized and reestablished it as the supreme law of the land.

One of these instances was the reestablishment of the independence of the judiciary to which I have referred, and while they were doing that they assembled into a documentary statement certain of their fundamental rights, which they had long claimed as a part of their constitution, but which by the power of the kings and the construction of the judiciary which the kings controlled, had been denied to the English people. But these rights still lived.

When we came to write our Federal Constitution we brought forward into the written documents not only the provision with regard to the judiciary to which I have referred but the Bill of Rights as well. We did not borrow that Bill of Rights from the British Constitution or the provision with reference to the tenure of the judges from the British Constitution, as our commentators sometimes erroneously state. They belonged to us as much as they belonged to the people on the other side.

This seeming digression is in fact not a digression. It gives us a more comprehensive, though imperfect view, of our general constitutional development, moving us toward the creation of our Supreme Court and the establishment in that Court of the powers which the Constitution assigns to it.

Obviously we can go no further into an examination of our constitutional development which took place on the other side of the Atlantic; neither shall we be able to examine the philosophy of Paine and others asserting the non-supremacy of kings and parliaments and judges and human government as against the inalienable, natural rights of men, asserting the inherent limitation upon the fashion and power of governments and the discretion of governments and of their agents. We shall not be able, either, to examine the Colonial Charters, the forerunners of our State and Federal Constitutions, and in many respects the most interesting and most important part of our written constitutional development. In passing may I recommend especially an examination of the charter of Rhode Island granted in 1663. Everything considered, that charter of the little colony of Rhode Island, granted 277 years ago, is one of the greatest state documents of all time.

It is known, of course, that the State constitutions preceded the Federal Constitution and contained all the basic provisions later incorporated in the Federal Constitution and many of its less important provisions as well.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENTAL DEVELOPMENT

Our Federal governmental development, in the scheme of which the Supreme Court has so large a place, both in its natural position and in the result of its decisions, began, no doubt, soon after the establishment of the American Colonies. The facts of common interest among the people of the Colonies, the influence of common origin, in the main, the same language, similar institutions, the same governmental instincts, community of interest, common dangers, and later joint achievements in behalf of the common interests, began early to draw and to press this homogeneous people back upon themselves into greater and greater solidarity and unity.

The articles of "Firm and Perpetual League of Friendship," entered into in 1643 between the jurisdictions of Massachusetts, Plymouth, Connecticut, and New Haven, have so many provisions and characteristics common to both the Articles of Confederation and the Federal Constitution as to leave no doubt of their close relationship. Just as the meeting called by Simon de Montford in the thirteenth century was the forerunner of the British Parliament this meeting and its resolutions were the forerunners of the Continental Congress, the Articles of Confederation, and of the Constitution of the United States.

We often hear the statement that the Revolutionary War was fought under the Articles of Confederation. The fact is that the Articles of Confederation were not ratified until the spring of 1781, and Cornwallis surrendered in the fall of that year. There is another erroneous statement, that when the Federal Constitutional Convention met, the Articles of Confederation were, figuratively speaking, thrown out the window. A comparison of the provisions of the Articles of Confederation and those of the Constitution and the weight of probabilities make that statement absurd.

SUPREME COURT ORIGIN

The Supreme Court was not the first to function as such a court in this country. Prior to the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, the Continental Congress made of itself a semivoluntary Supreme Court in certain matters of the then inchoate and embryonic Federal Government. From their membership they created what they first called a committee, and later on they called it a court to which it was directed that appeals should lie from proceedings with reference to captured vessels. These vessels were being claimed as prizes of war. All sorts of conflicting interests and claims were growing out of these transactions. In some instances the citizens of foreign nations and foreign governments were involved. During the siege of Boston, Washington was compelled to give much time to the adjustment of these controversies. He wrote a letter to the Continental Congress asking that something be done about it. In response, Congress requested that the colonies erect courts, where they did not already exist, to try issues arising out of such captures, and to allow juries in all cases, and that all appeals be to the Congress. Not only was this class of cases appealed to, and adjudicated by the tribunal created out of the personnel of the Continental Congress, but a serious dispute between Pennsylvania and Connecticut over their boundary line was adjudicated. A great practical lesson was learned by those experiences and later it became fixed in the Federal Constitution that there should be a Supreme Court of the United States, and that its judges should have jurisdiction of the class of cases adjudicated by this voluntary Federal tribunal.

Controversies, conditions, and the helpful services of a tribunal authorized to adjudicate such controversies, and the need for a governmental agency strong enough to enforce the judgments of such a tribunal, helped to impress the necessity of a "more perfect union," with a court clothed with such judicial powers as were later given to the Supreme Court by the Constitution.

SUPREME COURT DECIDES CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS

While the independence of the judiciary had already been established, it remained to be determined in this country whether the Supreme Court of the United States has the power to declare void an act of any Federal agency, or of the States, which it deemed to be in violation of the Federal Constitution.

The great controversy with reference to the Supreme Court, which arose out of the decisions of Marbury v. Madison (2 L. Ed. 60, 1803), of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 L. Ed. 579, 1819), and Dartmouth College v. Woodward (4 L. Ed. 629, 1819), and so forth, brought definitely to issue whether the Supreme Court had authority to declare an act of Congress and an act of a State unconstitutional.

We are all familiar with these great, far-reaching decisions. Jefferson challenged the authority of the Supreme Court to declare an act of Congress, or an act of the States unconstitutional, contending, in substance, that the other two departments of the Federal Government and the States are each charged with a responsibility to the people of acting within their respective constitutional limitations; that our constitutional system provides an adequate remedy and practical machinery for its enforcement—popular elections. He felt that to give to the Supreme Court the power to declare the acts of agencies of the Federal Government and of the States void, and also to be the sole judge of its own constitutional power was so incompatible with the nature of a democracy that it would destroy the Government.

Judge Roan, of Virginia, led the people of Virginia in their attack on Marshall. Marshall was very much aroused. He seems to have written many letters; he urged the necessity of the friends of the Government to arouse themselves; he considered that there was danger of a reaction toward the old Government under the Articles of Confederation. The thing which seemed to have affected him most is indicated by the following quotations from one of his letters:

I cannot describe the surprise and mortification I have felt that Mr. Madison has embraced them—

Referring to Virginia's contentions, insisted upon by Mr. Jefferson.

SUPREME COURT NOT THE FIRST TO DECIDE CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS

It is an interesting fact that Marshall, however, was not the first to claim the right and the duty of the judiciary to pass upon the constitutionality of legislative and administrative acts. In an opinion by the Supreme Court of New Jersey, Holmes against Walton, 1780, though the record is not to be had, it seems clear that it was held that an act of the legislature providing for a trial by a jury of six men was void because it was violative of the New Jersey Constitution.

There was much controversy in the following session of the legislature with reference to this and other similar decisions. In the case of Commonwealth of Virginia against Caton, decided in 1782, the court gave the opinion that it had the power to determine the constitutionality of an act of the legislature and to declare those acts void which were contrary to the Constitution. Prior to 1814, there were numerous other State court holdings to the same effect in New York, Connecticut, North Carolina, South Carolina, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Vermont.

Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, in the Federal Constitutional Convention in 1787 said:

In some States the judges had actually set aside laws as being against the Constitution. This was done too with general approbation.

While there was much criticism of the decisions of Marshall, particularly in Virginia, Kentucky, and Ohio, there probably was fairly general approbation throughout the country.

In Worcester v. Georgia (8 L. ed. 483), decided in 1832, the Supreme Court of the United States held that an act of the Georgia Legislature, undertaking to regulate missionaries among the Indians, was unconstitutional. The State of Georgia ignored this decision. The executive branch of the Federal Government refused to lend itself to the enforcement of this judgment. Finally, the matter ended by the missionary's being released after some 18 months' confinement. This was perhaps the most severe blow which Marshall received during his long judicial career.

It is an interesting coincidence that Georgia had figured in another very important decision by the Supreme Court (Chisholm v. Georgia, 1 L. Ed. 440). Jay was then Chief Justice. It involved an action for debt by a citizen of another State against the State of Georgia. The decision, rendered in 1793, held that a State could be sued in the Federal courts at the instance of a citizen of another State. Two days after its rendition the eleventh amendment to the Constitution was proposed in Congress and the following December it was submitted. Ratification was not completed until the beginning of 1798. No action seems to have been taken in the matter, however. There were several suits similar to that of Chisholm against Georgia already pending. But before the first of these pending cases (Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 1 L. Ed. 644, 1798) reached the Supreme Court, the eleventh amendment had been ratified and the court in a unanimous opinion held, in view of its phraseology, that the judicial power of the United States "shall not be construed to extend," instead simply that it "shall not extend" to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens, or subjects of any foreign state, that the amendment had a retroactive effect, and thus the Court would renounce jurisdiction in any case of this nature, past or present.

It is worthy of note that when the judgment against the State of Georgia was affirmed, Georgia responded by a statute prescribing the death penalty against anyone who would undertake by any process to enforce the judgment within the State.

LESSENING JUDICIAL RESTRAINT UPON OTHER GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES

With the election of Jackson in 1828, the fight on the policies of Marshall was renewed with great vigor. Chief Justice Taney, who had been in Jackson's Cabinet, was a great influence in the Supreme Court in lessening the restraint which that Court had exercised upon the States and departments of the Federal Government.

It is not at all improbable, if we had time to examine beneath the surface of developments as they are given to us by the historian, we might discover that one of the reasons for the change in the policy of the Supreme Court might have been the fact that union among the States at the time of the change had by natural processes made considerable progress. It is not improbable that it was a natural thing that the Supreme Court should have been instrumental in helping to concentrate governmental power at the point where this union was taking place. Public opinion, the arbiter in disputes affecting the public interest probably helped determine the matter. As when a broken bone is being healed or the parts of plants are being engrafted upon each other, nature seems to move its energies to the point of weakness, to strengthen it by what means it can, until the unifying fibers by natural processes shall have done their work.

It may be also that Marshall was so absorbed by his concern for the establishment and preservation of a strong central government, that he overlooked or underestimated the importance of preserving the efficiency and virility and fundamental sovereignty of the several State democracies which had created the Federal organization as their agent to do for them certain things which individually they were not able to do and to act as the repository of certain governmental powers which they each surrendered to the others.

On the other hand, Jefferson and Jackson and their associates may have underestimated the necessity at that time of permitting governmental strength to move to the points in the governmental structure where union among the States was being effected by natural processes, but had not yet become an actuality. These observations are not so fantastic as at first consideration they may appear.

MOVEMENT OF GOVERNMENTAL POWER DURING NATIONAL FORMATIVE PERIOD

In the whole process of national development, when tribes are blended into principalities and principalities into petty governments and these petty governments into a great nation, it is a historical fact that governmental power moves up from the people and from the smaller units of government to the point where union among the newly associated peoples and territories is being effected. That always happens. It seems to be in response to natural law. Clearly the adoption by the States of the Federal Constitution did not unite the people of the States; it did not constitute of them a nation.

I do not believe there is anything more interesting than the history of our own Union—the history of how we came to be a nation—the history of how we got into the big row in 1861. I think it is perfectly clear as we look back at it now. An examination of the debates in this Congress discloses the different stages of the growing together of these States. The Constitution was like the tape wrapped around plants being grafted. If there be proper adjustment, if there be kinship in those plants, Nature gets to work—Nature did get to work. If we had the time, I would like to direct your attention to significant utterances on the floor of this House and in the other Chamber in the different crises of the country, showing clearly the relative stage of the development in our becoming a nation.

I will mention, however, one example. John Quincy Adams and 12 of his associates, when Texas was about to be admitted, issued an address to the people of the country in which they said that the admission of Texas would amount to a dissolution of the Union, and the non-slave-owning States would not, and should not, submit. Just across the river here was a gentleman—Wise, of Virginia, who was in this House—and it made him very angry—the idea of these Yankees uttering these treasonable things right here in the Hall of Congress—and he moved to expel them. Seventeen years after that Wise was the head of a Confederate regiment trying to put into effect the doctrine which Adams had declared, and the Adams crowd were having conniption fits about these things that Wise and his people were doing. If it were not so closely associated with that great tragedy, it would be an amusing thing.

STRUCTURAL REASON OF WAR BETWEEN STATES

We do not have time to examine the details of that development. It is sufficient for us to note at this time that we have come to be a nation. We were overlong in arriving at our nationalization, due primarily to the fact that in the beginning the institution of slavery as a foreign substance was left in the Constitution lying between the two great sections, North and South, and soon there was added to it the policy of the protective tariff. The States of the two sections had long been united.

Each of the great sections, when in control of the Federal organization, used that organization to promote and protect its interests with regard to these two issues. Lying side by side, these two issues were too thick for the fibers of union to penetrate. As a result, under the increasing strain, in 1861, we broke at this point of weakness. The Southern States which theretofore had denounced the doctrine of secession which had come from Northern States, having lost control of the Federal organization, pulled apart, seceded. The Southern States seceded because they had lost control of the Federal Government. The Northern States did not secede because no one secedes from that which he controls.

As a result of the War between the States, one of these foreign elements was removed, and as a result of economic developments the protective tariff has been largely absorbed into the general economic and political body of the two sections. We are now a Nation united.

GOVERNMENTAL PROGRESS IN A DEMOCRACY

We have been a nation, probably since the Spanish-American War, certainly since the World War. When a people, operating our sort of government, have reached that stage in their national development, it is historically established fact, and one with which reason has no difficulty in agreeing, that from that time forward all progress in such a government must be in that direction which moves governmental power away from the central organization to which it was moved at the time when the processes of unification were taking place or great emergencies were being dealt with, back into the smaller units of government which are the natural instruments for the functioning of a democracy. Democracy is a government by the people. In order for the people to govern and to continue to develop their capacity to govern they must have the power to govern and the necessity to govern as close to them as it is practical to place it, and there must be provided for their use governmental machinery adapted to the exercise of these functions by the people.

For too long a time we have overemphasized the Federal organization in our scheme of government. We ought to have been moving this overallocation of power and governmental responsibility away from it long ago. Just as Nature moves strength to the point of union when union is being effected, when union has been effected it requires of peoples operating systems of free government to move that power back into their democratic governmental organization, or pay the penalty which Nature inflicts upon a people who have had an opportunity to cooperate with the plan of Nature and refuse to do it. That is something for the statesmen of America to think about. If the people will not do it voluntarily, they are driven by the lash of tyranny to the performance of their neglected duty. I challenge anybody of any political philosophy to contradict the statement that it is a historically established fact and in harmony with reason that after the formative period of a democratic nation there can be no progress in that system except in that direction which moves the power and necessity to govern away from the center and back toward the people, who are the government.

We are not dealing with an academic thing. We are not dealing with a speculative thing. We are dealing with something that is supported by history and to which common sense must agree, because in a democracy there are no governors except the people.

THE STATES' GOVERNMENTAL MACHINERY ADAPTED TO REQUIREMENTS OF DEMOCRACY

Fortunately for us, the States, not too large territorially and which function in the main through smaller units of government, the chief officers of which are chosen by the people, afford the opportunity and the machinery for the functioning and development of democratic institutions, and for the development of the governmental capacity of the people, who are the governors in a democracy.

In our whole governmental history all commentators, insofar as I know, agree that the Habeas Corpus Act, the Magna Carta, the Petition of Rights, the Bill of Rights, and our own Declaration of Independence made great epochs in governmental history, because their effect was to decentralize governmental power and move it back toward the people. On the other hand, no great monument comparable to these can be found along the road which democracy has traveled, marking the place where governmental power and responsibility have been moved away from the people toward the central governmental agency. That is not progress in a democracy.

The Federal organization is a necessary agency of these States to do the things for them which it was created by them to do, but it was never intended to be and never can be the functioning machinery through which the people can discharge the general responsibility of government. It is too big, too far away; the total of its general responsibilities too vast. Its machinery is not adapted to that service. Out of an executive personnel which has now grown to the enormous number of 987,538 persons as of the month of December 1939, at an annual salary as of that month of $1,827,678,708, only one of this approximately 1,000,000 people is elected. There cannot be any possibility of popular control of such an organization.

EFFECT UPON DEMOCRACY OF LOSS OF STATE SOVEREIGNTY

The States must resume the status of the responsible sovereign agencies of general government or democracy cannot live in America. What is the use in trying to deceive ourselves about that?

When we relieve the States of governmental responsibilities which are within their governmental capacity, the power to do the things of which they have been relieved departs from the States. Nature will not permit any power to remain where it is not used. Every time that happens the total governmental strength of the States is lessened and they are left with less and less ability to discharge their remaining duties.

There can be no uncertainty as to the effect of that policy upon the States, especially, when, in addition to that, we tap the sources of State revenue; bring to Washington the money required by the States to discharge their governmental duties; send a part of that money back to the States as loans and gifts from the Federal Government to the subdivisions of the States, their counties, their cities, their school districts, private businesses, and private citizens, and thereby, in these matters attach them directly to the Federal Government and bring them directly under the operation of the Federal governmental power.

By this process we are not only weakening the States but are actually dissolving them. At the same time, we are destroying the self-reliance, the courage, the stamina, and the governmental capacity of their subdivisions and of the people—the most deadly thing that can be done to a democracy. When we do all these things, we do what the declared enemies of our democracy could not do to the structure of our Government and to the governmental capacity of the people, upon whose capacity to govern our democracy absolutely depends.

It is axiomatic in our system of government—and I think it is axiomatic everywhere—that he who controls the purse strings controls the government. This was demonstrated when the House of Commons got control of the purse strings in England. It took a long time, but now the Commons are supreme because they never turned loose the purse strings.

We are making a similar demonstration in this country, except that it is in exactly the opposite direction. As we increase State and local governmental dependence upon the Federal Treasury, dispensing money which has been got from the people of the States, the Federal bureaucracy tightens its grip upon the purse strings and increases its governmental control.

We have turned back on the course of democratic progress. Progress is not fast. We are going very fast. Progress is uphill. We are going downhill. That is the easy way.

Democrats, Republicans, people of the Nation today celebrating a great occasion, we talk about what these men have done in the days gone by. What are we doing? How well are we doing it? No foreign foe has put his foot on American soil in a hundred years. We have everything in this country that God could give to make a people happy, prosperous, and contented—plenty of material for food, clothing, and shelter; plenty of railroads; plenty of money; plenty of means; plenty of everything—plenty of everything except the intelligence and patriotism required to operate a system of free government. Yet we strut around here and expect people to call us honorable. Shame upon us in America! Shame upon the statesmanship of America! We are all responsible. I take my share and you can take yours.

When we destroy the independent governmental responsibility of the States, the sovereignty of the State is destroyed and the possibility of the preservation of democracy is practically gone. What I am saying is fundamental. I am talking about things that are fundamental, vital things, as important to me and to you as the love for liberty. I am not talking about anyone, I am talking about a situation; I am talking about the result of the operation of the laws of cause and effect.

As it was the responsibility of our people 150 years ago to establish the Federal organization, in just as definite a sense it is our responsibility to preserve this democracy, not only for the sake of the democracy but for the sake of the Federal organization as well. There can be but one end to a policy of continuing to weaken the structure of the underlying States and at the same time continuing to increase the Federal overload.

This is not a partisan matter; it is not a sectional matter; it is not that of any department. None are free from responsibility. It is the concern and business of all the people, of all the parties, and of all the officials of all the departments of government, Federal and State.

Whether you agree with me or not, I hope that what I have said will be received in the spirit in which it is spoken, and that it will be provocative of thought and of an examination of the facts.

You and I are in responsibility at the high peak of human history, charged with a duty different from that which Madison confronted, different from that which Marshall confronted. They and the statesmen of that time were confronted with the responsibility of helping to hold these States together until they could grow together and form a nation. It was their business to preserve this Nation. It is our business to preserve this democracy.

No greater challenge ever came to any people of any age than the challenge which comes to you and me at this time. It is well for us on this, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of the Supreme Court, celebrating as we do a great event in the history of our Government, to be conscious of the fact that we are in responsibility at a time when deliberate persons of sound judgment are deeply concerned for the future of this country. Only a people humbled by the sense of great responsibility, earnestly desiring to know the truth, candid enough to face it, whatever it may be, and courageous enough to do what duty requires, whatever the sacrifice, can make certain the preservation of this democracy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein an address by the Honorable Charles Evans Hughes, Chief Justice of the United States, at the exercises commemorative of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the first session of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Supreme Court Chamber; also the addresses delivered upon the same occasion by the Honorable Robert H. Jackson, Attorney General of the United States, and by the Honorable Charles A. Beardsley, president of the American Bar Association.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 1674 and to include therein a few excerpts from letters.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made this afternoon in the Committee of the Whole and to include therein some telegrams I received with reference to the work of the dry-land stations.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made in the Committee of the Whole this afternoon and to insert therein in connection with the acreage of cut-over lands in the United States a table showing the cut-over areas in the various States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a radio address I shall make this evening.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, at Topeka, Kans., on January 29.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article on certain phases of the Philippine situation as it relates to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein transcript of a radio program last night containing speeches by Senator ADAMS, the gentleman from Oregon, Congressman ANGELL, and me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. St. Claire, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 7342. An act to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL FOR 1941

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1941.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, with Mr. COLE of Maryland in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] is recognized.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be reported by the Clerk, so that the Committee will know just what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the Bulwinkle amendment.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, on page 8 of the report of the Committee on Appropriations there appears this statement:

BUREAU OF AGRICULTURAL CHEMISTRY AND ENGINEERING

The Budget estimate of $120,300 includes a reduction of $56,575 to be transferred to the four research laboratories. The committee believes that the entire activity should be taken over at once, beginning July 1, by the research laboratories and that the amount of $3,200,000 for the latter is sufficient to absorb the reduction resulting from the elimination of this item from the bill.

Agricultural engineering investigations: The Budget estimate of $349,669 includes an allotment of $30,000 for dust explosions for the prevention of dust and farm fires. This project has been in the bill for a great many years and the committee have annually examined the results obtained from the expenditures for this activity. In former years it has reluctantly retained the item. In the present bill the project has been eliminated in its entirety for the reason the committee is convinced that the results do not justify the outlay.

The committee has not studied the full proposition and what this division has accomplished. I could give you pamphlet after pamphlet here showing that this division has investigated numerous fires and reported on them from all over the United States. In Texas when there was a gas explosion in a school down there several years ago they called for an investigation by the Department of Agriculture. This group made the examination and made a report. Let me give you briefly some of the accomplishments of this group.

IMPORTANCE OF THE WORK

Dust explosions and fires in plants handling or processing products of agricultural origin cause heavy losses of life and property.

In 660 explosions investigated by the Chemical Engineering Research Division 485 persons have been killed, more than 1,000 injured, and the property loss has exceeded $50,000,000.

In one grain-elevator explosion and fire at Chicago in 1939 nine lives were lost and the property damage amounted to about $3,500,000.

The grain destroyed in that explosion and fire would be sufficient to provide bread rations for an army of 500,000 men for an entire year. This indicates the importance of research work on this project and shows its close relation to a national emergency.

The dust-explosion hazard exists in practically all grain-handling plants such as grain elevators, flour and feed mills, and plants engaged in the processing of agricultural products such as the preparation of starch, sugar, powdered milk, and other food products.

The losses from fires on farms in the United States amount to approximately $100,000,000 annually, with a loss of about 3,500 lives. Of this loss at least $15,000,000 annually is the result of the spontaneous combustion of hay. If the losses from other fires in rural communities of 2,500 population and under are considered, the above fire loss will be more than doubled.

RESULTS OBTAINED IN THE WORK

Dust-explosion losses for the last 10 years, 1929 to 1938, inclusive, have been $8,000,000 less than for the previous 10-year period, 1919 to 1928, inclusive, which would amount to an average annual reduction of $800,000.

The adoption of protective measures recommended to industrial plants following research work by the Chemical Engineering Research Division has resulted in reduced insurance rates. There has been a reduction of approximately 74 percent in insurance rates on starch factories and in some cases as high as 93-percent reduction in insurance rates for terminal grain elevators.

The adoption of new types of construction in dust-producing industries which incorporate venting equipment for the release of explosion pressure will no doubt reduce still further the dust-explosion losses in such industries. Recommendations covering the amount of venting area necessary in different plants are based on the research work of the Chemical Engineering Research Division at the Arlington Farm Testing Station.

New developments in the utilization of agricultural products make it necessary to work out new methods for protection from dust explosions and fires. Special attention is being given to the development of safety codes for the prevention of dust explosions in new industries.

The investigation of the spontaneous combustion of hay has included laboratory research, large scale storage experiments and field surveys during harvesting seasons. Eleven large scale storage experiments have been carried out, and these tests, in conjunction with the laboratory work, have contributed materially to determining the conditions for the safe storage of hay, particularly with respect to the proper curing of hay before storage and the questions of proper ventilation and size of mows in storage. A better understanding of the fundamental causes of spontaneous heating and ignition also has been acquired.

Specifications and recommended practices have been worked out for protection from fires on the farm and in rural communities. This information covers construction of farm buildings, fire-fighting equipment, the storage of flammable liquids, and the prevention of spontaneous combustion.

EFFECT OF REDUCTION ON THE WORK

Because of the reductions in the amount of the appropriation for this work, it has been necessary to curtail the research carried on by this Division. Last year work at the dust explosion testing station at Arlington Farm was suspended, and this year the work on farm fires has been discontinued, including both laboratory and large scale field tests on the spontaneous heating and ignition of hay. In consequence it has become impossible to obtain the necessary information for the prevention of dust explosions during fire-fighting operations and in the operation of grain-handling plants, and it has ended the development of methods for the prevention of spoilage and fires in hay storage.

The activities of this Bureau of Agricultural Chemistry and Engineering have resulted in decreased insurance rates. There has been a reduction of approximately 74 percent in the insurance rates on starch factories and in some cases as high as a 93-percent reduction in the insurance rates on terminal grain elevators. I could speak at length on what this division has accomplished. Here are a number of bulletins that have been issued. They have been used and various addresses have been made to the Fire Chiefs' Association and other organizations in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I ask support for my amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure and privilege to go along with the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina. I am always particularly glad to follow him in matters of agricultural legislation.

But this item has a peculiar and a rather interesting history. Many years ago an explosion occurred and somebody in the House thought it would be a good idea if Congress would investigate the cause and see if a remedy could not be found to prevent future explosions. So an item was included in the agricultural appropriation bill for this purpose and we have been appropriating for it ever since. They put the item in and forgot about it.

Like the snuffboxes in the Senate and the quill pens in the Supreme Court, it has been carried along year after year with practically no returns to the country whatever. We still have explosions when sparks meet combustible material, and houses still burn when lightning strikes a dry roof, and there has been no appreciable diminution in either. The Texas explosion, to which the gentleman has referred, was not within the jurisdiction of this item. As a matter of fact, they were severely reprimanded for stepping outside of their jurisdiction, as their functions are exclusively restricted to agricultural explosions.

This item has been in the agricultural appropriation bills all these years largely by sufferance. Now, when the pinch comes, and it is necessary to cut out some of the dead timber in the bill, this was one of the first items which attracted the attention of the committee. The committee unanimously recommends that the item be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that every Member of the House who was privileged to stay today during the interesting ceremonies just completed was encouraged and inspired by the splendid remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER] and the distinguished and able gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. Certainly they inspired us to have great faith in the perpetuity of our democratic institutions and our free government. I hope that inspiration may be translated into a very practical effect, coming happily as it did right at this crucial moment. In that connection, I am tempted to advert for just a moment, if I may with propriety, to an Associated Press article carried in today's paper in which it is stated:

Secretary Wallace yesterday assailed the House committee action with a statement that the proposed $154,000,000 reduction under Budget estimates would inflict "a grave injustice" on farmers and would impair industrial activity and employment.

Then quoting the Secretary directly, it has him say this:

I want to put the farmer on guard against attempts of some Congressmen to scuttle the farm program.

Further quoting the Secretary—

I would ask the farmers this question when they went to vote, "Which way are you most likely to be taken care of in 1941?"

With restraint, I merely observe that in my judgment an observation of this sort by a Cabinet Member, while a measure having regard to his own Department was under consideration in the House of Representatives, is in most questionable taste. [Applause.] The Committee on Appropriations were fully aware of the sentiments of the Secretary of Agriculture. Inasmuch as he has adverted to what the farmers might do in 1940 on account of the agricultural program, I am just wondering whether someone is getting ready to have an alibi.

If there has been a failure—and I do not say there has; whether or not this agricultural program has been all that it should be something that you gentlemen who know agriculture, and I do not, can say, but I can say this—if there has been a failure it is not because Congress has not provided adequate funds for the Department of Agriculture. [Applause.] Rising from a sum of about a half a billion dollars in 1933, this year we give the Department of Agriculture from all sources more than a billion dollars to spend for the farmer, yet there are those who say that the problem has not been solved.

I deprecate the statement of a Cabinet officer made, if not for the purpose, certainly with the effect of turning the heat on the legislative branch of the Government. I believe the House of Representatives and the Senate in their ultimate good judgment will just about come as near knowing what is good for the agricultural population of the United States as Mr. Wallace. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am as anxious as any Member of this body to see agriculture rehabilitated. The American farmer has had a hard time. I have time and again voted for measures and funds to try to help him. I do, however, refuse to admit that the limit of our ability to help him is to continue all sorts of benefit payments.

The Secretary makes mention of what the farmer may do in November. I deprecate the fact that it is suggested that we are here legislating for ballots in November. Maybe it is true that we are, but certainly I deprecate the suggestion that that is what is motivating us in what we do. I hope we are trying to do what is for the best interests of our country, and not doing it simply and solely and purely for the purpose of trying to get the farmers' vote in November. Unhappily, we have done too much of that. Unhappily, we have hopped the farmer up with dope just before election every time.

Maybe some of these days the agricultural population of the country will awaken from the stupor produced by feeding them so much dope in the form of benefit payments and come to find out that after all we were not doing them a service, a real service, when we continued to give them an inoculation of this sort every once in awhile. If we can do it, I should like to see us approach a real, fundamental solution of the agricultural problem, and not every year have to be giving out subsidies and gratuities. I do not believe the American farmers want that. I think they want to see parity, and to have an opportunity to earn on their farms a living just as the businessmen and the laborers are able to do. I think if we can direct our attention in that regard we will then really be getting nearer a solution. I rose principally, however, for the purpose of saying that I thought it was unfortunate that the Secretary of Agriculture should inject himself into this situation, and do it with a threat. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request from the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not approve of the statement of Secretary Wallace to which the distinguished gentleman from Virginia has just referred. I do not like, any more than the gentleman from Virginia likes, the idea of a Cabinet officer trying to coerce or intimidate Members of this House. Neither do I like to see our Committee on Appropriations setting itself up as a superlegislative committee. The Appropriations Committee is offering the American farmer as the first sacrifice upon the altar of false economy. [Applause.] The committee is apparently now dominated by the ideas of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. I am sure you will recall that the gentleman from Virginia tried to do away with the Farm Security Administration in a one-man fight which he led the last time that this matter was before the House and yet the House approved the appropriation for farm tenancy. He has likewise opposed parity payments.

This committee is seeking by this bill to nullify the deliberate judgment of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. We approved the farm-tenancy program as an experiment and I, for one, would like to continue it for a sufficient length of time to demonstrate its true worth and success. Unfortunately, every time we ask for an appropriation for the purpose of carrying on the experiment, we are not only called upon to discuss the amount involved, but we are forced to again sell the fundamentals of the program to the Members of the House. I still regard the program as an experiment and I believe that we should continue it as such. I thought that our committee and Congress fully understood and appreciated the character of the program upon which we embarked a few years ago. Now, the Appropriations Committee wants to stop the program, abandon it, and nullify everything that has been done in behalf of an unfortunate group of our people.

In the light of the information furnished to the House on yesterday by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, to the effect that more than 95 percent of tenants being assisted under the land-purchase program have been able to meet their payments and in many cases to pay more than the amount currently due, and to the effect that these payments amount to 159 percent of the sum due by these tenants who are being aided by the Government in becoming home owners, it seems to me that we have before us concrete and convincing evidence that we are making headway with the program.

We have heard members of the Appropriations Committee criticize and ridicule the Committee on Agriculture but the fact remains that much has been accomplished through the farm programs undertaken during the present administration, criticism to the contrary notwithstanding.

I know that there are many farmers in Virginia who are in great distress at this hour. I know that the farmers of Virginia start into this year with great uncertainty. I know this because the farmers in Virginia are engaged in producing the same crops that are produced in my own district and in my own State, and I know what this administration, through legislation enacted by Congress, has been able to do for the farmers of Virginia, of North Carolina, and of other sections of the country.

We are embarking upon a huge program of national defense and we are spending millions and billions for relief and for other causes but we have no right to offer the American farmer as a sacrifice upon the altar of national defense or false economy. A prosperous and contented agriculture is the best national defense this Nation can have. When we destroy the "bold peasantry" of this Nation, our Government will not long survive. [Applause.]

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to see two good friends on the majority side engaging in a controversy. I am sure, however, that it is refreshing to all of us that they have opened up this subject about the distinguished member of their party who happens to be the Secretary of Agriculture. I did intend to say something about his statement accusing Congress of scuttling agricultural appropriations.

The Secretary says that Congress is scuttling the ship for agriculture. Does he really mean that? Just how far has the Secretary of Agriculture gone with the President of the United States in his attempt to secure parity payments? Is it Congress that is responsible for scuttling the agricultural appropriations or is it the President and the Secretary?

The President has not asked the Congress to appropriate parity payments and I therefore assume that the Secretary made no request of him for the necessary sum. Therefore it appears that the Secretary of Agriculture is trying to take the responsibility away from the President of the United States and himself and pass it on to Congress.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sorry, I do not have the time.

Last year when this bill was under consideration Mr. Wallace blamed the Republicans in the House of Representatives for attempting to scuttle the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. This year he takes in the whole Congress, irrespective of party affiliations, and seeks to put the blame on all, when the responsibility belongs on himself and the President of the United States.

Let us see what Mr. Wallace has done in his help for the farmers. He says he wants to give them parity prices, but when he is telling them that he is going to furnish them with parity prices, he demands of the Ways and Means Committee the continuance of the "free trade" reciprocity law which the farmers know will mean lower tariff duties and an additional flood of cheaply produced competitive imports into the United States to further depress the market on our farm products. [Applause.] He seems to think that when he is ordering the taking of 40,000,000 acres of good farm land out of production in this country, he has the right to give foreign farmers the full benefit of his scarcity program.

The New Deal slogan seems to be, "Mr. Foreign Farmer, go ahead and produce a million or more acres of competitive farm products and ship them into this country. We will take care of you." Oh, he says the amount which the foreigners ship in here is a small amount of our domestic consumption and it does not make any difference. But I can show you time and again when a cargo of New Zealand or Australian butter has come into the port of Philadelphia, Baltimore, or New York the price of butterfat has been depressed 1 and 2 cents a pound to the farmers of Minnesota. It makes no difference as to the amount of the commodity that comes in; it has a detrimental effect upon the price level received by American farmers.

Those of us who believe in protecting the honest toil of American agriculture and labor feel that we are right when we demand this consideration for our fellow Americans.

What a pathetic thing it is for Members of Congress, for American citizens, to be compelled to fight with one group of our citizens and ask them to help us protect American citizens. That is all we are doing in this so-called reciprocal-trade fight. We want to maintain American life for our American citizens.

Therefore I think the responsibility in this issue which has been injected by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] and the gentleman from North Carolina, belongs with the Secretary of Agriculture himself and with the President of the United States, who has failed to ask the Congress for proper appropriations to bring parity prices.

I do not know how many of you people are aware of the fact that last year the Treasury of the United States made a present to foreign producers of gold—an outright gift—of nearly $1,400,000,000. We purchased last year from the countries of the world $3,574,000,000 worth of gold, for which we paid $35 an ounce. A couple of days ago we celebrated the President's birthday. We all wished him well, a lot of happiness, and many more birthdays to come. Yesterday we celebrated the gold policy of this administration to give away something from the American people to foreign producers.

The reciprocal-trade program, the monetary policy, this free-trade policy of the administration, is all ruining American labor, agriculture, and industry. If we want to continue such a policy, then we must do what Mr. Wallace and Mr. Hull and Mr. Roosevelt tell us to do. If we are for American citizens, then we should scuttle their ship and get back to earth again and provide something sound for American citizens, so that they may make a profitable living without the necessity of continuing on doles and injections from the United States Treasury.

I hope that when these additional provisions come up we will have sense enough to legislate as we see it should be done for the best interests of our country rather than to follow the political utterances of the Secretary of Agriculture or any other Cabinet member. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for the Secretary of Agriculture. I think an examination of the hearings had upon this bill will disclose that I was somewhat critical of the actions of his Department with respect to the administration of several items of the appropriation bill for the present fiscal year. I do believe, however, that the Secretary of Agriculture is an able and conscientious man.

That, however, is aside from the subject I want to discuss now. I want to do something, if I can, to keep the Record straight, in view of the remarks which were made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN]. The newspaper article to which reference was made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], in his remarks did not quote the Secretary of Agriculture as having criticized the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives for failure to make appropriation for parity payments. What was said in that alleged quotation from the statement made by the Secretary had relation entirely to the cut of $154,000,000 plus, under Budget estimates; and as has been pointed out, parity payments were not included in the Budget estimates. Therefore nothing that the Secretary of Agriculture may have said could possibly have been construed as criticism of the Appropriations Committee for failure to exceed the Budget and provide parity payments above Budget estimates.

The subcommittee handling agricultural appropriations always calls the Secretary of Agriculture when it begins its hearings on the agricultural appropriation bill, and the committee hears him at length and asks his advice. It feels that because of his position and his experience in the actual handling of these appropriations he is in position to give advice of very great value to the subcommittee. I can conceive of no reason why he should be pilloried because of his attempt to make some suggestions to the Congress as a whole with regard to the actions which it should take concerning the estimates for appropriations submitted for the next fiscal year. These estimates were prepared in his Department under his supervision.

In fairness to the Secretary, I want to point out that if you will read his statement before our subcommittee you will find that he did not ask us to make provision for an appropriation for parity payments. He was specifically asked whether or not he recommended that parity payments be provided for in the bill, and he declined to submit any recommendation even to the subcommittee. So he cannot be justly criticized here today upon the ground stated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN] that he is asking Congress to do something that his Chief, the President of the United States, has failed to ask the Congress to do, by the submission of a Budget estimate for parity payments, because he has not done that, either before our subcommittee or in the newspaper article to which exception is taken. [Applause.]

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I voice the sentiment of the great majority of the people in this country when I state that it is not right, it is not fair, to make the farmer the victim of this economy drive that is going on today. Why single out the farmer and cut the appropriations made to the agricultural interests of this country in 1 year over half a billion dollars? I want someone to tell me why the farmer should be singled out in this economy drive.

The gentleman from Minnesota said that the policy pursued by our Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, is not only detrimental to the farmers but that it is ruining the labor population of our country. I challenge both statements. I know when I came to this Congress back in 1932 the total income of all the farmers of America was something under $4,000,000,000; and I know now that their income has gone up until it is around $8,000,000,000 or $9,000,000,000. We have made, to say the least, some progress. I am not here to say that we have not made mistakes, but I am here to say that this administration has dealt justly with agriculture and is the best friend the farmers of America ever had, and I believe has the backing of 90 percent of the farmers of America. [Applause.]

Let me say this with reference to labor: I am glad labor is back of the farm program. I am glad to see labor recognize the farm problem as their problem, and I believe the farmers feel the same way toward labor. Their problems are common. Anything that adversely affects the farmers adversely affects labor. And, conversely, anything that adversely affects labor adversely affects the farmers. I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. Oliver, president of Labor's Nonpartisan League, endorsing the Wallace program and asking those in Congress from urban and industrial areas to join hands in the fight to put back upon the statute books those items that have been taken out by the subcommittee on agricultural appropriations.

The letter is as follows:

LABOR'S NONPARTISAN LEAGUE,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1940.

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FLANNAGAN: Labor's Nonpartisan League regards it as most important that the severe cuts made in the appropriations for the various agricultural functions of the Government be restored. It is to labor's interests as well as to the interest of the rest of the American people, that American farmers have security and prosperity.

We wish to put especial emphasis on the restoration of the amounts of the Farm Security Administration and food-stamp plan. The Congress of Industrial Organizations at its national convention went on record for the expansion of both of these very important Government functions. Many State and local units of Labor's Nonpartisan League have expressed themselves similarly. The establishment and extension of the stamp plan, for example, has brought hope to hundreds of thousands of workers and has received the enthusiastic support of the retail industry.

Labor's Nonpartisan League wishes to urge especially that in the common interest those who represent urban and industrial areas join to restore the appropriations necessary to the welfare of the American farmers.

Sincerely yours,

E. L. OLIVER,
Executive Vice President.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, let us look at this question in a sensible way. We all know that this 50-percent cut is going to seriously cripple agriculture, and that when we undermine agriculture we are tearing away the foundation from under our economic structure. Then why do this foolish thing in the name of economy? I know that right now economy seems to be a mighty popular word, but do not get it into your head that it will act as a shield to protect you while you rape the farmer. I have noticed that most of the applause on the floor today in response to statements derogatory of the Department of Agriculture and the farm program came from the left. I did not hear the Democrats over here on the right applaud the onslaught that has been going on against the farmers of America, and I am here to tell my Republican brethren that they had better take heed of Mr. Wallace's warning or they will pay the penalty next November, for they need not think their Republican constituents are going to send them back to make the farmers of America the goat of an economy drive. [Applause.] They will not stand for it. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman conclude his remarks in 5 minutes?

Mr. HOOK. Yes; I can.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday afternoon certain remarks were made on the floor and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I shall not read those remarks or refer to them further than to read a letter dated January 29 from the Attorney General. It reads as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1940.

HON. FRANK E. HOOK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: This acknowledges receipt of your letter of January 22, 1940, enclosing a copy of an affidavit of David DuBois Mayne, together with photostatic copies of certain letters allegedly signed by William Dudley Pelley, which you referred to in your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I shall be very glad to give this matter consideration.

With kind regards,

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

Mr. Chairman, at the proper time, and within the next couple of days, I intend to rise to a question of personal privilege. At that time I expect to give to the House a chronological story in narrative form from the beginning of this episode with regard to the Pelley letters and others right down to the present day. I will not do this today.

Yesterday afternoon when it was brought to my attention that Mr. David Mayne made the statement that the letters were a forgery, I had in my possession, and have had, an affidavit sworn to by Mr. Mayne before a very reputable notary public in the city of Washington that he was well acquainted with the signature of Pelley, that he saw him write his signature, and that the signatures were authentic and genuine on the instruments attached to that affidavit. There was grave doubt in my mind after the report made that this gentleman said he committed forgery, that those were forged. I therefore took the instruments that I had, and which were placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with all other letters signed by Pelley that were in my possession, to the Department of Justice and asked them to examine them very minutely and give me a full and complete report with regard to the matter.

The statement I want to make here now is that many men on the floor of this House have made statements that later they asked to have withdrawn. In view of the fact that there is some doubt as to the authenticity of these letters—and I am not at this time at liberty to say they are not authentic until I get that report—I am going to ask at the proper time leave to withdraw the Pelley letters and the statements with regard to the Pelley letters.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I cannot yield.

The statement made was based on much information that the House does not have but should have. Other information in connection with this whole episode has been sent to the Department of Justice.

I may have transcended the rules of this House in presenting those letters, but many other Congressmen have done that. However, deep down in my blood and my body I feel that, far above any office that I hold, far above any office that any man holds in this Nation, are the fundamental principles of democracy, and if I have to violate the rules of the House to bring forth things that I think might in any way stain those foundations, I would do it. It is unfortunate that a real American citizen who loves his Nation should be placed in a bad light through documents claimed to be forged by a person who was in the employ of the so-called Dies committee. Certain Members here claim to have inside information with regard to these documents. If that is so, then, of course, the committee must have had that knowledge. I hope that is not true, because if it is, then, of course, no Member of this House will be safe in presenting any evidence to this House without taking the chance of being framed through trickery of employees of investigating committees. This would be a very vicious thing in a free nation, close to the methods of the Gestapo. God forbid that should ever come to pass here. At the present time I am saying that I feel I am going to ask at the proper time to have those remarks withdrawn.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, salaries and expenses, Bureau of Agricultural Chemistry and Engineering, $868,775, of which amount not to exceed $457,602 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia, and not to exceed $3,725 shall be available for the purchase of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of field work outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALEXANDER: On page 50, line 1, after "Columbia", insert "of which amount not less than $25,000 nor more than $50,000 shall be used for the investigation and development of methods for the manufacture and utilization of starches from cull potatoes and surplus crops."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is, of course, subject to a point of order, but if the gentleman wishes to discuss it, I shall reserve the point of order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment in order to call attention to the need in the producing areas of the Nation for the establishment by the Department of Agriculture of exactly what my amendment calls for; that is, a study of means to utilize starches taken from cull potatoes and other surplus crops.

In this bill we have already appropriated for several different items which would, it seems to me, give the Secretary of Agriculture plenty of funds with which to do something constructive. As I have already said today, the people of my district are asking what our Government officials are doing with all these tremendous sums of money. I have before me four items in this bill from which we might use some money along the lines I am suggesting in my amendment. Under the "Office of foreign agricultural relations" we are appropriating $196,396. I will touch on that in a moment. Under a "special research fund" we appropriate $1,400,000. Under this section, the Bureau of Agricultural Chemistry and Engineering, we are about to appropriate, after amendments, upward of $1,000,000, the committee's recommendation being $868,775. Under the "Bureau of Agricultural Economics" we have a recommendation for another $838,900.

In my remarks before the House exactly 1 year ago today I called attention to the fact that we are shipping into the United States a tremendous amount of starch, principally in the form of sago and tapioca, which comes in in competition with cull potatoes or the starch that might be taken from them and from corn, from wheat, and from rice. I assume most of the Members of the House are interested in some one or more of these farm products and the surpluses we have in them and the low prices the farmers receive for same.

Mr. Chairman, I shall insert in the RECORD at this point a chart showing the importations of tapioca, sago, and other starches which resulted, in 1939, in a total of four hundred seventeen million, six hundred thousand-odd pounds of starch being shipped into this country—and duty-free, mind you, because there is no duty on this sort of commodity; and in 1937, the total all-time high of 466,327,683 pounds was shipped in—in competition with the farm products of our country:

Mr. Chairman, in my district in Minnesota we have a couple of plants which were set up to extract the starch from cull and defective potatoes, but those plants today are not being operated. They are out of commission. They are standing there idle. The product one of them manufactured last year is still unsold because of the tremendous competition from foreign starch. In the entire State of Minnesota we had 17 such plants, which are now closed, all but the one in my own district at Dalbo. In the State of Maine we had a similar number of plants, 23 to be exact, and in the State of Idaho others, and so on around the Nation we had these plants set up, organized, and doing business, until this tremendous amount of foreign competition put them out of business.

Now, the point I want to make, and the reason I suggest this amendment, is that we should have an allotment or earmarking of from $25,000 to $50,000 for the use of the Department of Agriculture, with an instruction and order from us to use it for this purpose, namely, to help these plants which have been set up and are ready to go, to get on a competitive basis, where they can manufacture starch out of these waste products which are now lying around this country, and rejuvenate and aid these plants so they can produce, as it were, in competition with the starch which is being shipped in from foreign nations. [Applause.]

I wish also to suggest to the proper committee of the House that they immediately take steps to investigate with the idea of so reducing by tariff imposition or otherwise as to prevent the further dumping here of sago and tapioca starch, which in 1937 amounted to the enormous sum of 466,327,683 pounds, or nearly 40 percent of this country's total starch consumption.

This means direct and destructive competition with Maine, New York, Minnesota, Montana, and Idaho potatoes; competition with Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota corn; with our wheat; and our Southland's rice; and a continual reduction or depression of farm prices in general because we cannot hope to compete with this duty-free, cheap, tropical-labor production and retain our high standard of living or civilization.

No doubt you appreciate the fact that a fair proportion of several important agricultural crops are converted into starch, either for sale as such or as derivatives of starch, such as sirup and sugars. In the case of corn about one-third of all the corn grain shipped to the primary markets is converted into cornstarch, or into one of a multitude of its derivatives. In short crop years the proportion is even greater. The corn-refining industry consists of 14 plants, which have processed in recent years from 58,000,000 bushels in 1935 to 87,000,000 bushels—in 1926 and also 1929—of shelled corn annually. Over 68,000,000 bushels were processed in 1937. The corn-refining industry in recent years has paid the United States farmers more money annually than they have received from any one of 68 different crops, and there are only 78 important crops. This industry paid out more money for corn in either 1936 or 1937 than the farmers received from the sale of their corn grain in 46 out of the 48 States.

The United States potato-starch industry is large in Maine, where from 1,000,000 to 5,000,000 bushels of potatoes have been processed annually since 1927–28. Some potato starch is produced in Minnesota. About 15,000,000 pounds of wheat starch and approximately 1,000,000 pounds of rich starch are produced annually.

These industries are primarily American, using domestic labor, capital, and equipment. The corn-refining industry is a heavy-goods industry. The United States starch industries are liberal consumers of goods and services of other industries. Extensive use is made of paper and cotton bags. Chemicals and coal are an important item. The transportation of, first, the raw agricultural products to the plants and the accumulation of supplies, and then the shipment of the starches, their derivatives, and the byproducts to consuming centers are reasonably important sources of revenue to the railroads.

A severe competitive situation exists in the starch industry. Every starch-producing product, every kind of starch, and every product competing with any starch is subject to a tariff, except tapioca and sago, two tropical starches which enter the United States free of duty. According to the Tariff Act of 1930, all starches are subject to an import duty. However, the Tariff Act of 1930 classifies tapioca and sago as "flour," although in various publications the Tariff Commission and the Department of Agriculture refer to them as starches. In addition they have been bound to the free list by the Netherlands Trade Agreement.

In binding tapioca and sago to the free list, through the medium of the Netherlands Trade Agreement, the Department of State caused United States agriculture, particularly the Potato, Rice, Wheat, and Corn Belt farmers, to lose an important outlet for cash crops. To date the only manner by which the Department of State will permit agriculture to meet the competition from the duty-free starches is on a price basis. To effectively compete with the imported starches, corn as a raw material for cornstarch production would have to decline below the current level of prices, which, from the Corn Belt farmers' standpoint, is generally considered unsatisfactory to the maintenance of a reasonable income and standard of living.

THE PROBLEM OF CULL POTATOES IN MINNESOTA

A few years ago Minnesota supported a potato-starch and flour industry. There were 17 plants for the manufacture of high-grade potato starch and flour that helped the farmers by returning to them some profit on the small or defective potatoes that were graded out to maintain the size and quality required for table stock. Only one plant, at Dalbo, is now in operation. Plants at Cambridge and Princeton are still usable but have not operated for several years. The plant at Dalbo still has unsold its last year's production of 100 tons of fine-food quality starch. Close grading, if again established, will again yield a sufficient quantity of low-grade stock to reestablish this industry and give employment to Minnesota labor.

The potato-starch industry in Maine operated 23 plants with aid from the Government to farmers for diverting potatoes. Idaho operated 4 factories for their cull stock. Starch and potato flour were sold to the Surplus Commodities Corporation and given to the relief administration for distribution. One hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds were shipped into Minnesota to relief clients and the flour was well liked. It is used for gravies, fish balls, frying, potato bread, and it makes good mashed potato. This competed with the Minnesota plant at Dalbo, that received no governmental support.

The United States is the only country that produces starch that does not protect its producers by an import tax.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein some of my own remarks which I placed in the RECORD a year ago today.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, the amendment providing for the investigation and development of methods for the manufacture and utilization of starches. Unless the gentleman from Minnesota can present some authority in law for the appropriation, which has not been called to the attention of the Chair, the Chair is prepared to rule. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will concede the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Japanese beetle control: For the control and prevention of spread of the Japanese beetle, $395,000.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BENDER: On page 51, line 13, after the comma, strike out "$395,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000."

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be given 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, when you consider the entire amount of this bill, this is relatively a small item, and yet I feel it is an important one.

I do not know how many of you have taken the trouble to learn more of the work of the Bureau of Entomology. Last year at this time I called attention to this item, and because I was new here I did not press the amendment. Since that time I have acquired some knowledge of this Bureau and have read considerably regarding its work. I have no criticism to make of its work generally, and I think pretty generally it is doing a fine job, but this item interests me because I have yet to find where the Department has done any constructive work in connection with the eradication or the elimination of the Japanese beetle.

The Japanese beetle, I understand, is to be found in the eastern part of the country and in the Middle Western States, such as Ohio, and in western Pennsylvania, and also in the State of Virginia.

I have inquired of the Department head regarding his work. I have asked for information as to what has been accomplished over the past 25 years in doing something about this particular insect. I have gotten pages of one- and two-dollar words that are meaningless, but I have not received anything from the Department to indicate that the money has been spent to advantage. Each year we appropriate approximately $395,000 for the fight on the Japanese beetle, and the next year we are asked to appropriate a similar sum without being given any information regarding the result of this effort on the part of the Bureau of Entomology. Incidentally, the reason it has come to my attention is because I drive a motor car and on the highways near my home city are several of these quarantine stations. Here you find two inspectors and they have a little house. I do not know what they use that little house for, but they have a lot of lanterns along the road and they stop every motorist, and as the motorist stops they mumble some words. If you ask them the second time what they want, they ask you if you have any plants or any vegetables in your motorcar. As a matter of fact, they never stop to look and they do not investigate. Most of the motorcars now have trunks on the rear of them that they could open and lift up and see if you had plants or shrubs, but they never take the trouble to investigate.

In a letter I received today from the Acting Chief of the Bureau, Mr. Avery S. Hoyt, he states this regarding the habits of the Japanese beetle:

The adult of the Japanese beetle is a very strong flier and can travel considerable distances by natural means.

He is not a hitchhiker at all. He travels by "natural means." How many of these Japanese beetles have ever gotten into the motorcars of the citizens along the highways?

I am asking that the money be eliminated from the bill that is spent for these fellows along the highways that annoy the citizens of the country in asking them if they have any Japanese beetles or mumbling words that are not understandable by the average citizen. At times I have known motorists to be in line for half an hour, and when their turn came these fellows simply mumbled a few words to them.

I am willing that $50,000 remain in the appropriation, and my amendment so provides, but I am asking to cut out of the appropriation $340,000, most of which is used for the purpose of annoying our people without doing them any good.

The Acting Chief of the Bureau makes this further statement:

Its gradual spread from the known infested areas has been very largely by this method—

That is, by flying. And here we are making a hitchhiker of him. [Laughter.]

Frankly, I am appealing to your common sense and your good judgment. Incidentally, I read a book by an American entomologist in which he pays his respects to the Members of Congress.

In this book I read that he considers Congressmen a lot of numbskulls. I can readily understand why he feels that way about Members of Congress when they will pass appropriations of this kind and vote hundreds of thousands of dollars year after year for such purposes. This has been going on ever since 1916. Let us give it to some of these poor farmers or to somebody else who needs the money, but for God's sake do not give it to these inspectors on the highways.

When this measure came up in committee I noticed the only gentleman who asked him a question was the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]. He said, "Are you controlling the spread where you are using it?" and Dr. Annand said, "We have not gone far enough to know. That is one of the hopes we have."

On a hope we are spending millions of dollars, and we have spent millions of dollars. Now, let us stop this foolishness. If we can get rid of this beetle, let us use the $50,000 and let them show what good they are doing with it. You might just as well throw the money down the sewer as to spend it on these quarantines along the road.

A previous Congress got rid of the corn-borer inspector in the same way. They got rid of them because they knew they could not do anything about it in that way. Let us get rid of these quarantines along the highway and use the money to better advantage. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in order to reach a proper understanding regarding the control or any attempt at control of any of the injurious insects, it is necessary that the members of the committee know something about the history of the insect.

The Japanese beetle which we are trying so hard to combat in the United States is dangerous because it is an imported pest. When, by some means or other, we have imported a pest from some foreign country, it becomes particularly dangerous because we do not, as a usual thing, import the natural enemy of the pest. Each and every destructive insect or bird or animal, in its own proper native locality, has there the natural enemy of that destructive agent, which naturally keeps it in a controlled state where it is not destructive. But when it is imported into some other section, the enemy of the pest is not imported, and then it becomes particularly dangerous. Under conditions of that kind it is incumbent upon the Government of the United States in order to protect the farmer and all others who are interested, to supplement by artificial means the destructiveness of the natural enemy of the bird or insect or pest.

In the control of the Japanese beetle it is necessary that plants and shrubs in transit be inspected, insofar as possible. I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER] to the fact that when they are inspecting plants and shrubs they are not looking for the adult beetle. They are looking for the eggs or the larvae, because that is when the beetle will distribute its kind over an area wide enough to cause extreme damage.

The gentleman from Ohio says he has been unable to see anything that the Bureau of Entomology has been doing to control this pest. I call his attention to the fact that all over the area affected by the Japanese beetle are to be found Japanese beetle traps. I know from experience from looking into them that they are exceedingly effective in catching a great many of the adult beetles. Of course it is impossible to catch all of them, but I do not see how we could afford to allow a pest like this to proceed with its devastating work all over the country and not take some steps to try to combat it. Everything of that kind is a matter of public concern and unless natural agencies are supplemented in some respect, these insects which we have imported will soon overrun us and destroy all of our agricultural products.

I also call attention to this fact, that there are in the United States 6,500 nurseries and greenhouses in the regulated area. There are 6,500 nurseries and greenhouses, and the stock that goes out from those nurseries all over the country must be inspected before it goes out, in order to prevent this pest from being further scattered. The gentleman's own State of Ohio is being protected from the infected area of Pennsylvania by these Japanese beetle-inspection stations, which are doing the best they can to prevent the beetle from moving westward. I am satisfied that they are not working 100 percent. I am satisfied that there are men in that service who do not examine everything a citizen has, but if they go into all the cars passing and try to dig into every package there would be a howl go up about snooping by agents of the Federal Government. So I think the committee should leave this item in the bill in order that we may try as best we can in our feeble way to control this destructive insect, and in order that we may carry on the research work necessary to reach a higher state of efficiency along this line. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we carry in this bill money for the control of a large variety of insect pests from the gypsy moth in New England, the Dutch elm disease in Massachusetts, the boll weevil in the South, the Mexican fruitfly in Texas, the blister rust in the West, and an infinite variety of pests of this character infesting every State in the Union.

We can eliminate all of these, or any one of them, and the country would still go along. I may say, however, that the Japanese beetle is probably the most generally destructive of any of these pests because it attacks every farm of vegetation—not only the garden crops, field crops, truck crops, but grasses, shrubbery, and trees themselves. The most serious results that would follow the elimination of this fund, however, is the fact that it would in effect erect a barrier against commerce in nursery stock at every State line.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BENDER) there were—ayes 42, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gypsy and brown-tail moth control: For the control and prevention of spread of the gypsy and brown-tail moths, $375,000.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOREN: Page 52, line 18, strike out the paragraph beginning in line 18 on page 52 and ending with line 6 on page 53.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the paragraph has not yet been reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct; the paragraph has not yet been reached. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do this not to criticize and not to make suggestions, but for information, if it is to be had.

About 40 years ago a naturalist living within a mile of my house imported some gypsy moths and allowed them to escape. The result was that within a very short time my neighborhood was devastated. The matter came to the general court, as we call our legislature, and an appropriation was made to wipe out, if possible, that pest. After a year or possibly two there was a revolt against that program in the legislature and those who criticized succeeded in preventing further appropriation. A year or two more passed and that pest had traveled through Massachusetts, was working over into New Hampshire and Maine, and its destruction had become formidable. Appropriation was renewed and as far as I know my State is still spending money to care for this matter.

I would like to know from the chairman of the committee, if possible, whether this expenditure by the National Government is likely to continue through the lives of all of us and until kingdom come, or whether any progress at all is being made in wiping out this pest.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. In response to the gentleman's inquiry, the testimony before the committee was that while we are controlling the spread of the pest, there is little likelihood we shall ever be able to exterminate it. Unquestionably Congress will be asked year after year to continue this appropriation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Dutch elm disease eradication: For determining and applying methods of eradication, control, and prevention of spread of the disease of elm trees known as Dutch elm disease and of a virus disease of elm trees prevalent in the Ohio Valley, $400,000, to be immediately available: Provided, That, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, no expenditures from this appropriation shall be made for these purposes until a sum or sums at least equal to such expenditures shall have been appropriated, subscribed, or contributed by State, county, or local authorities, or by individuals, or organizations concerned: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the cost or value of trees or other property injured or destroyed.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOREN: Page 52, beginning in line 18, strike out the paragraph, ending on page 53, line 6.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I feel that this item is a fair test of the wish on both sides of the aisle to economize so far as unnecessary expenditures are concerned. I am in full accord with the movement on the part of a group of Members here to increase the expenditures for such programs as the surplus food stamps and soil conservation, but here we have an item of $400,000, and in this great document of 1,593 pages a half page was devoted to consideration of the item. There is not one word, not one line, not one single point that would justify the expenditure of this $400,000.

The chairman of the distinguished subcommittee asked the question which sums up the argument. What is being done? For 6 years they have been appropriating $400,000 and in 6 years they have gotten exactly nowhere. They have done nothing except spend $400,000 a year to pay unnecessary salaries and to pay individual farmers for cutting down trees on their own farms. They have done absolutely nothing about the purposes for which this appropriation was made. If the Members of the House are in good faith, if they are interested in economy, here is a place for the wise use of the ax of economy.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. A year or two ago I took occasion to consult the hearings and the records at that time. Witnesses who appeared on behalf of this appropriation stated that they knew no more about the cause and cure of this pest than they did when they started and admitted in effect that all of this vast amount of money that had been spent over a period of years had amounted to nothing thus far.

Mr. BOREN. I think the gentleman is right. This is not a bug or beetle to be quarantined in this tree disease. They propose here to attack the fungus growth that attaches itself to individual trees. Thus far they have been paying the farmers a part of this $400,000 a year to cut down trees on their own land. The larger portion of this money has been spent for maintenance of personnel that apparently have been doing nothing. I have carefully examined the record of the hearings on this matter. On page 357 the testimony will bear out that absolutely nothing has been accomplished in the last 6 years to stop the spread of this disease. Again on page 579 of the hearings it is admitted by Department officials that nothing will be done next year to stop the spread of this disease. Again we are asked for $400,000, that, according to past records, accomplishes nothing, and will accomplish nothing. Great shades of bureaucracy! Will we give $400,000 to the Bureau which they admit is to be spent for exactly nothing so far as accomplishment is concerned?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised at the amendment just offered which would strike from this bill an item of $400,000 for Dutch elm disease eradication. There are many items carried in this bill for the elimination of such pests as the Mexican fruitfly, blister rust, and the cotton boll weevil. I do not pretend to know anything about those things, and I do not know what has been accomplished so far as blister rust is concerned, and I do not know what you are doing for the cotton growers; but I am willing to go along with the gentlemen in those parts of the country who do appreciate the need for this money and who vote these appropriations. We expect the same treatment from those parts of the country that do not realize the importance of the elm trees to the eastern part of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, to say that nothing has been accomplished, except going on the land of private individuals and cutting down trees, is a definite misstatement of fact which I can attest from my own observation. I can assure the gentlemen from those parts of the country that have not the good fortune to have elm trees that we have many elm trees on private property, on the main streets, and on the beautiful greens of New England which add hundreds of thousands of dollars to the value of the property. If anyone had doubted that statement, they could have gone up into New England after the hurricane and they could have seen the way the valuation of property had been destroyed because the beautiful old elms were stricken down during the hurricane. In my own home town of Wethersfield we have one of the largest elms in the United States. Our local chamber of commerce will tell you it is the largest elm in the United States. The people of that community willingly and gladly vote appropriations each year to keep that tree alive, to bring in experts to plaster up its joints, and keep it going for posterity.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of this committee in their desire for economy will not vote to strike this item from the bill, unless they are willing to be consistent and strike from the bill every appropriation for the eradication of any of the pests listed in the bill.

Mr. BOREN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. Has any method been found in the 6 years that we have been appropriating the $400,000?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly a method has been found.

Mr. BOREN. That is contrary to the statement in the hearings. Testimony appears on pages 357 and 358 of the hearings showing that they had not yet been able to find any way to control this Dutch elm disease.

Mr. MILLER. It depends on what you call control. By the same token we have been appropriating for the gypsy and the brown-tail moth for 32 years and have not eliminated those pests, but we have been keeping them in check.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. The hearings show that the tree specialists do not know the cause or the cure of this Dutch-elm disease. The money is being spent in destroying and cutting down trees.

Mr. MILLER. We know the cause. It is caused by a bug. Why it was born, I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. As a matter of fact, it is known that the virus of the disease is carried by this bug. The measures which have been taken for the control of this insect have been effective in its elimination. It has protected several hundred million dollars of elm trees in the north-eastern section of the country.

Mr. MILLER. That is the sworn information given to me by the Department concerned.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. I call the gentleman's attention to the hearings upon this question which are found beginning on page 577 and ending on page 583, in which there is a very substantial justification for this appropriation and in which it is stated by the experts of the Department of Agriculture that the method of eradication is the same as used in Florida in connection with the fruit canker and the success they are having is comparable with the success they had in Florida.

Mr. MILLER. And I might point out that, with one exception, this is the only insect-control project which calls for a dollar-for-dollar matching appropriation from the State before the funds from the Federal Government are available.

I thank the gentleman. I intend to ask permission when we get back in the House to insert in the RECORD three or four of the pertinent paragraphs of the statement referred to by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, those of us who live in the elm-tree section, and that comprises a very large proportion of the States of this Union, know that the elm tree has an enormous value as timber, and in addition it has a value beyond computation as an ornamental tree.

The center of this evil began, as so many other evils do, around New York. This lumber was introduced from Holland for the purpose of making veneer, and it brought over with it the Dutch elm beetle. Pretty soon we found in our section that the elm trees were dying. The results of the work of our Department of Agriculture have been manifest in this last year in cutting the number of diseased trees in two. While in 1938 we had some 18,000 or 19,000 diseased trees, this year the number has been reduced to 10,000.

This is one of the most remarkable diseases ever introduced into tree life. The bug carries a spore, an infection, the same as a typhoid germ. This germ enters the life stream of the tree, which is exactly like the life stream of the human body. It infects the tree and the tree dies. There is no way of getting rid of that tree as a carrier of infection unless you destroy it root and branch, and that is what is being done.

I am grateful to see that in spite of the necessity for economy in this election year there has been left $400,000 in this item. I beseech the distinguished chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Missouri, who has an obsession on this subject, to become sane enough and friendly enough to my district and my section of the country to let this item go through, as he did last year. When he is in his right mind on the elm tree disease he is a wonderful chap, and I hope he will be that way now. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, our committee reluctantly appropriated $400,000 for the purpose.

We have spent in all over $17,000,000 of Federal funds for this purpose but I regret to say we have never cured a single tree after it was once infected. We have never been able to stop the spread of the disease. It covers a wider area each year. They say the number of infected trees has been reduced, but that is because of the removal of the dead trees. All they have ever accomplished is to cut the trees and save the owners the expense of cutting and removal.

Apparently there is only one way to stop the disease, and that is for the States under their police power to cut the elm trees in the exposed zone. The disease can attack only within a certain distance. If they cut all the trees within that distance, leaving no trees to be infected, the disease will be stopped. No other practical remedy has been suggested.

We reluctantly reported an amount below the Budget estimate to show a desire to cooperate. If they will adopt effective control methods which promise results the committee will be glad to recommend the appropriation of any reasonable amount they feel is necessary to meet the situation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. THOMASON] having resumed the chair, Mr. COLE of Maryland reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8202) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made on the floor this afternoon and to include therein a letter received from Labor's Non-partisan League, referred to in my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the appendix and to include therein a letter addressed by Edward O'Neal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has requested me to ask that he may have unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks made by him in the House today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASSINGALE, Mr. BOREN, and Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona asked and were given permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a short editorial by William Allen White, of Emporia, Kans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made in Committee of the Whole and to include therein a letter and a table from the Bureau of Plant Industry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks that I made this afternoon and a second request to extend my remarks by including a letter from the finance commissioner of the State of Connecticut.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to withdraw my remarks of January 23; that is, all letters pertaining to the so-called Pelley letters and all remarks referring to those letters.

Mr. KEEFE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if in making this unanimous-consent request he will state at this time whether he has any mental reservations as to the authenticity of the letters which were incorporated in his remarks.

Mr. HOOK. I have submitted all those letters to the Department of Justice, asking for a full and complete report, and the gentleman, in his former capacity as prosecuting attorney, even though it may have been a small town, knows that that is the proper thing to do—to find out from the Department of Justice, and if the gentleman wants to object to my unanimous-consent request, go ahead and object to it. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to withdraw certain letters appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the date mentioned by him. Is there objection?

Mr. KEEFE. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the RECORD show that the request of the gentleman to expunge his remarks from the RECORD is not accompanied by any concession or admission as to the untruthfulness of those statements, and until that question is determined I shall object to any effort to clear the matter at this time, because I propose to address the House as soon as I can get time.

I will bring proof to this House that is uncontroverted that will disclose definitely to every Member of this House that these letters were forged and that those statements were untrue. I do not propose to leave this record stand and have word go out to the country that this record has been expunged, but that there is still doubt as to a conspiracy and as to the untruth of those remarks contained in the gentleman's speech.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's remarks be taken down on the question of conspiracy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the words objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

I do not propose to leave this record stand and have word go out to the country that this record has been expunged but that there is still doubt as to a conspiracy and as to the untruth of these remarks contained in the gentleman's speech.

Mr. HOOK. There was more than that; there was reference made to a conspiracy.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, all we know is what the RECORD says.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield that I may interrogate him?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes; I shall be very happy to.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman in his remarks referred to a conspiracy. I assume and presume he was not making a blanket accusation of conspiracy on the part of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KEEFE. I do not quite understand what the gentleman from Texas means by the term "blanket conspiracy."

Mr. RAYBURN. Or a conspiracy of any sort on the part of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KEEFE. I did not say that he conspired. I said that there was a conspiracy.

Mr. RAYBURN. I was asking the gentleman a specific question—if he were accusing the gentleman from Michigan of conspiracy.

Mr. KEEFE. No; I am not accusing him of conspiracy. I stand on the record, the words as stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Wisconsin has said that he did not refer to the gentleman from Michigan as being a conspirator, or did not accuse him of being a part of a conspiracy, the Chair rules that the words objected to are not out of order.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, Mr. Speaker; I object.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield during that 5 minutes?

Mr. HOOK. I will not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, all is not gold that glitters. Ever since January 23 the gentleman from Wisconsin has been making remarks with regard to matter I placed in the RECORD. I have this afternoon asked unanimous consent for leave to withdraw the letters and all matters pertaining to the Pelley letters from those remarks. He objects and refers to the fact that I should come out and make a positive, definite statement that the letters were a forgery. Probably the gentleman could under the circumstances make such a statement. I cannot.

I believe that officers appointed by the District of Columbia, which is a part of the Federal Government, have a certain duty to perform. They are clothed with a certain amount of authority. A notary public by the name of Wayne Birdsel, one of the finest gentlemen in the District of Columbia, a notary public, put this man Mayne under oath. On January 12, 1940, Mayne raised his right hand, and under solemn oath swore that the letters were authentic, that they were signed by Pelley and that he knew Pelley's signature, and that they came to him in the ordinary course of correspondence. We should be able to rely on that statement. I understand, however, that later this very gentleman appeared before the Dies committee and under oath stated that the letters were not authentic but that he forged the letters.

When are we to believe this man? Are we to believe that he perjured himself before the courts of this country, or are we to believe that he perjured himself before the Dies committee? Where did he perjure himself? Is he a forger? I do not know. The best place I could think of to find an authentic signature of Pelley was in the Department of Justice. About the only place I know of that we could rely on for an authentic signature would be the Internal Revenue Bureau where his income-tax returns are filed. I have no chance of examining those returns, but the Department of Justice has.

These letters have been given to the Department of Justice. When the Department of Justice reports to me, I will have confidence enough in their judgment to believe their examination.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I will present to this House the report of the Department of Justice. If the Department of Justice says those letters are not authentic, I am ready and willing to accept that statement. But let me say this with regard to the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin: I will defy him to waive his immunity on the question of conspiracy and make that statement openly, outside of and off the floor of this House, whether it refers to me, whether it refers to Mr. Weisberg, or whether it refers to Mr. Jackson. I would like to have the gentleman waive his immunity. I hope he does. Will the gentleman do it?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I would like to have an answer.

Mr. KEEFE. I expect to take the floor in a few minutes, with the consent of the Members of the House, and I will answer the gentleman then.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman waive his immunity? The gentleman will not waive his immunity, will he? I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman has stated that he has great confidence in the notary who notarized the affidavit he now possesses.

Mr. HOOK. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. What would the gentleman from Michigan say if the notary states he never swore Mr. Mayne at all?

Mr. HOOK. I do not know.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am asking the gentleman, what would he say then?

Mr. HOOK. It states right on there over the notary public's seal. Will he deny his writing?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The notary states he never did swear him.

Mr. HOOK. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And the F. B. I. tells us this afternoon it was Mr. Mayne's own typewriter that the letters were written on. Would the gentleman have any doubt then?

Mr. HOOK. Which letters?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The letters you put in the RECORD.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks which I made to this House yesterday, referring to the speech made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook], I thought I was charitable to the gentleman. I trusted he would come before this House and ask to have that speech expunged and apologize to the House. He has elected to seek to have that speech expunged with reservations, which leads to the conclusion he still harbors in his mind the thought that while he has asked to have that speech expunged, he still believes in the truth of the statements therein contained, which I very viciously and bitterly complained about because of the implication, the innuendos, and aspersions cast upon the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] and upon the Dies committee.

Mr. Speaker, I have before me the original statement given by the gentleman from Michigan to the press, apparently after he had learned of my statement.

I may say to the gentleman from Michigan that I had my office call him twice out of deference to him as a Member of the House to advise him that I intended to make the remarks which I made yesterday.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. But at neither time was my office able to contact him.

Mr. HOOK. I was at the Department of Justice.

Mr. KEEFE. You may have been in the Department of Justice. You seem to be spending a lot of time down there.

Mr. HOOK. That is the proper place.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I have the original statement given to the press, or at least one of them, by the gentleman from Michigan, which evidently must have been given after the statement I made on the floor of the House. In this statement he says:

I have the affidavit of David Mayne under oath that all the signatures are genuine Pelley signatures, written by Pelley. This, under oath, in contradistinction to a statement not under oath dragged out of him by the Dies committee in executive session.

If there should be any question of forgery, then the Dies committee is guilty of conspiracy to bribe a person to commit forgery to cover up their past nefarious acts.

It is typical Dies committee smearing to befog the real issue of collaboration with those closely connected with the Christian Front. The committee nor anyone else has ever denied, nor can they deny, the facts set forth in my first statement with regard to the Christian Front.

There was only one real effort made to overthrow the Government of the United States, and that came from below the Mason-Dixon line. It looks as if another effort is coming from that source.

That was a statement given the press by the gentleman from Michigan after he had knowledge of the fact that I as a Member of this House, on my oath as a Member, stated that those letters which he put into the RECORD were forgeries, and I repeat it—they are frauds of the worst character.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not intend to yield.

Mr. HOOK. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman did not yield to me.

Let me show you one of them. Here is one of the original letters. Look at it. You see that: "The Silver Shirt Legion of America. Office of the national commander."

You see it pasted on there.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. No; I cannot yield.

Mr. HOOK. That is not one of the original letters.

Mr. KEEFE. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOOK. It is not one of the original letters.

Mr. KEEFE. The Dies committee have produced these and will produce them in their report.

Mr. HOOK. Does the gentleman get access to the records of the Dies committee?

Mr. KEEFE. I have. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield to the gentleman.

There they are. There is the photostatic copy and here is the letter from which the gentleman quotes in his speech. Look at it. There is the original, a piece of typewriting upon which is pasted a letterhead, clipped off from the letterhead of Mr. Pelley, apparently, and then put under a photostating machine to produce this photostat to make it appear that they got a real piece of literature. Look at it. Why, the simplest individual in the world could look at that instrument or this one and see that there was something phony about it.

I also call your attention to the fact that there was not even the slightest effort to inspect this situation, because if you will look at the signature you will see that the signature is spelled "Pelly," not "Pelley." The testimony of Mr. Mayne before the Dies committee was to the effect that he had purposely and deliberately misspelled the name of Pelley so there would not be any question about their being forgeries and being fakes.

If the gentleman wants fakes, I will give him the rest of the photostats of the originals that the gentleman claims he has and from which he quotes. Here they are, all of them, and every single one of these letters has been testified to by Mr. Mayne as being a letter which he produced as a result of his own fertile imagination upon his own typewriter.

The Dies committee, despite the innuendoes to the contrary, have been pretty careful about this thing, so they have brought before the committee the typewriter of Mr. Mayne and had these letters examined by comparison with the typewriter of Mr. Mayne, which they subpoenaed. This afternoon, before the Dies committee, Mr. Charles Appel, special agent in charge of laboratories of the Department of Justice—

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not.

Mr. HOOK. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOK. The gentleman is quoting testimony taken before an executive meeting. The point of order is that this is out of order and the gentleman has no right to quote testimony taken in an executive meeting of a committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Wisconsin purports to discuss the executive proceedings of a committee it will not be in order.

Mr. KEEFE. I am not discussing the executive proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But if he is just quoting on his own responsibility—

Mr. HOOK. He has referred to the testimony.

Mr. KEEFE. I am quoting on my own responsibility.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman purport to quote the proceedings of a committee in executive session?

Mr. KEEFE. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If that is what the gentleman undertakes to do, the point of order will be sustained.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I will have to ask, then, that the remarks, if any, referring to the testimony taken in the executive meeting be stricken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All the Chair knows is that the gentleman says he is not purporting to quote the proceedings of an executive session of a committee of this House. If that be true, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. KEEFE. Let me say to the Members of this House that it seems rather strange that when I am endeavoring to bring out truth and fact I should be continually interrupted.

I am making these statements to you on my honor and my oath as a Member of this House, and I know whereof I speak. When I tell you that Mr. Appel, special agent of the Department of Justice in charge of laboratories, examined the typewriter of Mr. Mayne and compared it with these letters, and states that that typewriter wrote those letters, it ought to be pretty good proof to any sane individual, in connection with everything else, that the statement Mr. Mayne gave to the Dies committee that these letters were forgeries was the truth, despite the alleged affidavit which the gentleman spoke about and concerning which a member of the committee, the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. DEMPSEY], in interrogating the gentleman from Michigan, stated that the notary public who took that acknowledgment testified that he did not swear Mr. Mayne.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. He testified he did not even know Mr. Mayne.

Mr. KEEFE. I am willing to go this far, and say that one of the alleged affidavits was drawn in December and was not sworn to until January 12.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HOOK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman prepared to say, if he is so well acquainted with the affidavits, that the affidavit signed on January 12, 1940, did not state in there that Mr. Mayne was duly sworn?

Mr. KEEFE. I think the affidavit did so state.

Mr. HOOK. That is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin to proceed for 2 additional minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. But even though I am just a small country lawyer, I have had 30 years' experience at the bar, and in all the courts of this country, and I want to say that my experience is similar to that of every other lawyer here, and that is that affidavits of that character are not sufficient to be used to besmirch the character of any man from coast to coast in the United States without further investigation. [Applause.] Even though I am a small lawyer and a small prosecutor, as the gentleman said a few moments ago, I would not dare to use a document of that kind for that purpose without further investigation.

Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that this matter has gone from coast to coast. The charges which he made were emblazoned upon newspapers all over this country; articles were written in magazines; one of them prepared and written by one of the gentlemen who is a party to this thing, Mr. Jackson, and appears in The Nation; and there in that article is an alleged photostatic copy of this very letter which I showed to you, appearing in that article and telling the people of America that here is proof that Dies is connected with Pelley and the Silver Shirts and the Christian Front, and here is the affidavit. Oh, but that picture in The Nation does not show this clipped-off letterhead such as appears here. It is taken from this doctored photostat which was made so that you would not be able to see that they had stuck this letterhead upon this phoney letter, prepared and written by this man, Mayne.

Now, I ask you in all fairness, Members of this House—I did not want to object to the gentleman's request—

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, may I have just 1 more minute? The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. I did not want to object to the gentleman's unanimous-consent request, but in view of the statement which he gave to the press, which I read to you, after the statement which I made yesterday on the floor, and in view of the statement which he made in the Committee of the Whole prefacing his request, I cannot permit that speech to be expunged from the RECORD until there has been a full and complete determination of the facts, and the people of this Nation are apprised of the facts, and until they are told that at least a grievous wrong has been done to the members of this committee and to its chairman, the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES. [Applause.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken in Committee of the Whole today may have 5 days within which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise solely for one purpose at this time and that is to call the attention of the House to an article that appears in the New York Sun of yesterday's date. Nobody can charge the New York Sun with even being liberal, or in any manner connected with any movement that is for progress. The New York Sun is a pro-Dies newspaper because it has supported the continuance of the Dies committee. I do hope that what is stated in this article is not true, because I refuse to believe that Members who are opposed to the continuance of this committee are subject to the type of trickery that this article describes. In fact, I do fervently pray and hope that it is not true; but in view of the fact that this statement is contained in the New York Sun, a paper which is well established in the city of New York, I submit that the House should pause and give thought to the information that this statement contains. In fact, I submit that these statements contained in this article should either be investigated by the House or repudiated by the members of the committee. In all fairness to the members of the committee, I make no charges against them, and I repeat I hope that what is contained here is not true.

I am not going to quote the whole article. I will put it in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to put the whole article in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am going to quote from that portion which I believe to be entirely relevant to the proceedings here this afternoon, that is, I believe that these portions are relevant as charged, but I do not take responsibility for what is contained in this news article. The New York Sun says, and I now read from a special dispatch to the New York Sun by Glen Perry:

So far as the committee is concerned—

Referring to the Dies committee—

the Sun learned its first information regarding the plot to smear Mr. DIES came in the middle of December, when Mayne came to Rhea Whitley, then counsel for the committee, and told him that such a plan was afoot and that, although the original intention had been to work on J. B. Matthews, committee investigator, it had been decided to switch the attack on Mr. DIES himself.

As evidence of his credibility, Mayne told Mr. Whitley that on the following Sunday a Washington broadcast would make an attack on Mr. Matthews. The attack came along on schedule.

He also told Mr. Whitley that a speech smearing Chairman DIES was being written, and that it would be made by a Member of Congress—

Mr. Whitley, incidentally, was the attorney for the Dies committee. He no longer is. I understand he has resigned.

The article continues—and that it would be made by a Member of Congress not then selected. In this regard the committee has information that the speech was offered to and refused by another Congressman before Mr. Hook introduced it.

From that time on Mayne was making reports to the Dies committee on what was happening in the other camp. Thus the speech of January 22, in which Mr. DIES was attacked, came as no surprise to the committee, which had its counterattack in preparation.

Now, I submit that if Mr. Whitley had information and had been dealing with Mr. Mayne and knew what Mr. Mayne was leading these people into, and that he was selling to these people spurious and forged documents, then I say if this statement is true—and I am not saying it is; the New York Sun is saying it—if this statement is true, then the counsel of this committee engaged in this conspiracy just as much as Mr. Mayne. You cannot get away from that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Now, I am not making these charges. It is the New York Sun that is reciting this story, and I hope that it is not true.

Now, continuing the article—the article then goes on after a statement by Mr. Gardner Jackson. It says:

The statement of what the committee had learned, made public by Representative JOE STARNES, acting chairman, did not confine itself to the matter of the Pelley letters. Mr. STARNES announced that the committee has affidavits showing that "certain parties in New York City had offered large sums of money to the affiliates for the purpose of obtaining documentary evidence showing a connection or collusion between Chairman DIES and the Christian Front."

In this respect the Sun learned that on Thursday night representatives of the Dies committee, working with private detectives, arranged a "plant" in New York City, in which $4,000 was offered by a magazine editor for such documents.

Now, get this:

The committee representatives had with them false papers to be turned over in exchange for the money. Dictaphones recorded what was said, while the hidden detectives observed what was done.

I again say I hope this is not true. I refuse to believe that agents of a congressional committee of this House would employ private detectives to sell false documents to anybody who seeks information about a committee. Let us bear in mind what the essential question is here. This committee is not a sacred cow. Anybody has a right to fight this committee. Anybody has a right to obtain truthful information if such truthful information exists. But the committee has no right—and I do not say that the committee has done it; the New York Sun says it has learned that it has done it—it is between the New York Sun and the committee—the committee has no right, if what the New York Sun says is true, to get its agents to sell false documents so that somebody can be "let out on a limb" and then be crucified on the floor of the House of Representatives. That is the issue that is involved. That is the real issue before us. I do not take responsibility for the statements made in the New York Sun. The New York Sun made those statements. The New York Sun and the committee will have to thrash it out. We have here a question of veracity between the committee and the New York Sun. The House should be told the truth, as this is a most serious matter.

Since Members of this House have been charged with conduct which is not proper, since this issue has been raised, I think the integrity of the House is at stake and that an investigation of this matter should be made and be made now. Otherwise, no Member of this House is safe in disagreeing with, attacking, or attempting to obtain by proper means, truthful information against the committee which that Member is fighting.

LIGHT SOUGHT ON OPPOSITION TO DIES WORK—HOUSE GROUP TO FOLLOW UP CHARGES MADE BY FORMER PELLEY AID—LETTER FORGERY ADMITTED—DETAILS OF PRELIMINARIES TO PLOT TO SMEAR CHAIRMAN ARE REVEALED AT CAPITAL

(By Glen Perry)

The House committee investigating un-American activities was today making plans to hear testimony from two men accused of heading a group seeking to block continuation of the committee's work by smearing Representative MARTIN DIES, of Texas, its chairman. The charges were made in an executive session yesterday by David Mayne, who formerly was the representative in Washington of William Dudley Pelley, head of the Silver Shirts.

Mayne testified that letters from which excerpts were recently placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD linking Mr. Dies with the Pelley organization, had been forged by himself, for which he received $100 and a promise of a job in the Department of Agriculture. He said that he was approached about 2 months ago by Harold Weisberg, who, he said, works under Gardner Jackson, legislative representative of Labor's Non-Partisan League, and told that a group headed by Weisberg and Jackson wanted information that would show collusion between Mr. Dies and the Silver Shirts and other so-called American Fascist groups.

Robert E. Stripling, secretary of the committee, said that two meetings might be held late today to question witnesses. Both Jackson and Weisberg, Mr. Stripling said, have informed the committee of their willingness to appear, and they will probably be heard at once. A subpoena has been issued for a third man, John Mitchell Henshaw, said by Mayne to have introduced him to Weisberg, but it has not yet been served.

Desiring, he explained to the committee, to put the plotters "out on a limb," Mayne agreed to produce the evidence, and then forged the letters. Excerpts from them appeared in a speech which was put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Representative FRANK HOOK, of Michigan. Although Mr. HOOK, in answer to a question put to him on the floor of the House of Representatives by Representative KEEFE, of Wisconsin, claimed authorship of the speech, Mayne testified that Weisberg said he himself had written it.

TWO ISSUE STATEMENTS

Both Weisberg and Jackson have issued statements, Jackson defending his connection with the group opposing the Dies committee and accusing the committee of seeking to distract attention from the Hook charges, while Weisberg denounced what he called "a one-sided and inaccurate attack on me, based entirely on the remarks of a self-confessed forger."

Mr. HOOK was asked to be present at yesterday's meeting, but refused to appear, saying that he would not come before the committee in the absence of its chairman, who is ill at his home at Orange, Tex., and is not expected to be in Washington until the end of this week.

So far as the committee is concerned, the Sun learned, its first information regarding the plot to smear Mr. Dies came in the middle of December, when Mayne came to Rhea Whitley, then counsel for the committee, and told him that such a plan was afoot and that, although the original intention had been to work on J. B. Matthews, committee investigator, it had been decided to switch the attack to Mr. Dies himself.

As evidence of his credibility Mayne told Mr. Whitley that on the following Sunday a Washington broadcast would make an attack on Mr. Matthews. The attack came along on schedule. He also told Mr. Whitley that a speech smearing Chairman DIES was being written and that it would be made by a Member of Congress, not then selected. In this regard the committee has information that the speech was offered to and refused by another Congressman before Mr. HOOK introduced it.

From that time on Mayne was making reports to the Dies committee on what was happening in the other camp. Thus the speech of January 22, in which Mr. DIES was attacked, came as no surprise to the committee, which had its counterattack in preparation.

JACKSON'S STATEMENT

Both Jackson and Weisberg said they were perfectly willing to appear before the committee, and stigmatized the statement made public yesterday as typical of the smearing tactics of the committee. Jackson said that he did not know Mayne and that his backing of Weisberg was "the natural outcome of our mutual, deep concern over the un-American procedure indulged in by Congressman DIES and some of his committee associates, in such sharp contrast to the procedures followed by Senators THOMAS and LA FOLLETTE on the Civil Liberties Committee."

The statement of what the committee had learned, made public by Representative JOE STARNES, acting chairman, did not confine itself to the matter of the Pelley letters. Mr. STARNES announced that the committee has affidavits showing that "certain parties in New York City had offered large sums of money to the affiants for the purpose of obtaining documentary evidence showing a connection or a collusion between Chairman DIES and the Christian Front."

In this respect the Sun learned that on Thursday night representatives of the Dies committee, working with private detectives, arranged a "plant" in New York City, in which $4,000 was offered by a magazine editor for such documents. The committee representatives had with them false papers to be turned over in exchange for the money. Dictaphones recorded what was said, while the hidden detectives observed what was done.

"The affiants further stated," the Starnes statement continued, "that this testimony (the documents) was to be used to discredit Chairman DIES and the committee, and that they intended to furnish the information to Congressman HOOK."

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 6 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the first thing I want to say is that I long for the time when it will be possible for the House of Representatives to pay some attention to the basic problems of the United States. The second thing I want to say is that my own position as a member of the Dies committee, which I have tried to fill honorably, has been one of the most difficult jobs I have ever had. I am not going to tell you that I am going to tell the truth, I am just going to do it.

In the first place there can be no question of doubt in these United States about the right of any American citizen to be as bitterly opposed to this committee as he wants to be opposed to it; and I said once publicly, in the public press, that I felt that when the time came that people who opposed this committee were accused of being friendly to communism, or nazi-ism, or fascism, that we were in a very dangerous situation—and I do feel that way.

There is no doubt in my mind whatsoever but that the letters which appeared in the RECORD purporting to come from Mr. Pelley were rank forgeries perpetrated by Mr. Mayne. I am speaking personally. That is what I believe definitely established. In all fairness let me say that there is no evidence of anybody's having purchased from Mr. Mayne known forged documents, nor is there any evidence that anybody except Mr. Mayne had the slightest knowledge that those documents were forged. I think the record should be plain on this point.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. As I understand the gentleman's statement it is not at all in accord with my version, because it is my recollection that the sum of $105 was paid to Mr. Mayne.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Let me explain to the gentleman that I think he is correct. The point I was trying to drive home was that there was no evidence that anybody knowing the documents were forged, or were unauthentic, had secured those documents and used them; that the people who used those documents were under the impression that the documents were genuine at the time.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Does not the gentleman think that if the gentleman who used the documents—

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I was going to come to that if the gentleman will let me proceed.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. If the gentleman who used the documents had made any kind of examination at all, he would naturally have come to the conclusion that they were forged.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I believe that a great deal more care should have been spent in that direction. Such things obviously ought never to be used until the persons using them are positive about them. I think there is no question about that. I think that great care should be used by anybody, including the Dies committee, when they have under consideration important matters having to do with the reputations of people.

Now, I am going to do a selfish thing, I am going to point out that if the brief, plain rules of procedure about which I spoke when the continuation of the committee was under consideration, and which we should have had in effect all the time, if these rules had been in effect we would not have had to spend any time on a lot of these things. It would have helped tremendously, at any rate.

I come now to what the gentleman from New York had to say of the article in the New York Sun. I am only one member of the committee, and I do not by any means know everything about it, but so far as I know, no member of the Dies committee, nor anybody connected with the Dies committee, had the slightest knowledge of anything concerning the letters purported to have come from Mr. Pelley which were included in the statement of the gentleman from Michigan until they were presented in that statement. Am I correct about that? Is there any other member of the committee who would like to answer?

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. They were brought before the Committee on Rules the morning before the statement.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I meant until they were mentioned before the Rules Committee.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Just to refresh the gentleman's recollection, there was some testimony with reference to these documents presented at another meeting at which Members of Congress were present prior to the Rules Committee meeting.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I had no knowledge of that.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. The gentleman had no knowledge of that. The gentleman's position is, then, he had no knowledge of it until he received word at some time to that effect?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes. What I mean is this: The article in the New York Sun, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] read, at least the interpretation which he endeavored to put on that article, was to the effect that Mr. Whitley at any rate obtained from Mr. Mayne information about these letters. So far as I know, no member of the Dies committee or its staff had any knowledge about these purported Pelley letters until such time as they were presented before the Rules Committee.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Since I understand the gentleman's statement, so far as I am concerned, it is correct. The first intimation I had of any of this was when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] made the statement before the Rules Committee.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. May I ask a question for information? Does the gentleman from California or any of the other gentlemen of the committee know how many times Mr. Mayne conferred with Mr. Whitley during the month of December 1939?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I would like to speak of that in just a moment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I may say to the gentleman from California that his statement insofar as I am concerned is absolutely accurate. I had no information about the letters nor did I have any information about Mr. Mayne until the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] appeared before the Rules Committee.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. In view of the decision made today by the Dies committee to make this whole matter public, the sooner we make the record public, the clearer the picture will be. I understand that making it public has been delayed a little while. I want to say to the House I think it would be to the advantage of the House and to the advantage of the Dies committee to make these executive sessions that we have had public just as quickly as we can and I am for doing it right now.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am unalterably opposed to releasing a transcript of that record at this time, because many people's names have been mentioned who demand an opportunity to be heard before that record is released.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. The gentleman knows we voted today to make the record public.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Had I been there I would have voted against it until these people are given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. We voted to make the record public. In view of that vote, it should be made public.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he knew at that time that Members of the House of Representatives had been accused of certain things and desired an opportunity to be heard? Notwithstanding that he would release that record without giving them that opportunity?

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. I understand that we all agreed this morning to make the whole thing public.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I did not agree.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Everyone who was in the room at the time did.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not know what time you made that agreement.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Did not the gentleman from New Mexico know that we were going to make that decision today and that this matter was coming up?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I came over here on account of the farm bill.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. I am asking the gentleman, did he not know the matter was coming up?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I understood you were going to take some action, but I would like to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman state to the House whether or not this man Mayne was ever employed by the committee or any member of the committee?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. If the gentleman will let me proceed for about 3½ minutes I will get to all those things.

Mr. Speaker, in my association with Mr. Whitley, who is counsel for the Dies committee, I have never known anybody in all my life that I felt was any more honorable and upstanding an individual than is Mr. Whitley. About the first of December I was appointed on a subcommittee of this committee to try to find William Dudley Pelley and bring him before the committee to be examined. I was chairman of the subcommittee—worse luck.

I was very anxious to bring Mr. William Dudley Pelley before the committee in open hearing and hoped we might be able to get at the bottom of some of the things that have been done by Mr. Pelley and some of his organizations. In connection with that, one thing that occurred to me was to request the cooperation of the Department of Justice, which I did. Mr. Mayne presented himself and said he would bring Mr. Pelley in and wanting to take every possible chance of getting Mr. Pelley and feeling that in spite of grave misgivings regarding Mr. Mayne, that nothing could be lost by trying this. Mr. Mayne was dispatched to North Carolina for the purpose of securing information as to Mr. Pelley's whereabouts.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, that is the only connection Mr. Mayne had with the committee. His expenses were paid for that trip.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. His expenses were paid by the Dies committee?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. That is the gentleman we are hearing all this about?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right, for the purpose of attempting to bring in Mr. William Dudley Pelley. May I say further that the original suggestion that Mr. Mayne might be helpful in bringing Mr. Pelley to the committee and in giving information regarding Mr. Pelley was made by a certain very prominent individual in Washington, whom I will not mention. I do not think the gentleman would like to have me express it at this time. Suffice it to say that this gentleman is a liberal if there ever was one.

I was trying to get Mr. Pelley and do the best I could. That is all I have to say about that. I thought that was part of what we were asked to do. I am informed that Mr. Mayne later came to Mr. Whitley and in an attempt, apparently, to play both ends against the middle, talked to Mr. Whitley about the fact that there was some kind of a plan on foot to bring up things against the committee. That is all I know about that. I am quite sure that he did that. I am equally certain that in the course of anything he may have told him there was no reference whatever to anything having to do with these letters that are under question, for had there been Mr. Whitley would most certainly have told the committee about it, and he never did so.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Was the gentleman present when Mr. Mayne and Mr. Whitley conferred?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Not when Mr. Mayne did that. I was present on the occasions when Mr. Mayne was telling us how he could get hold of Mr. Pelley for us.

I should like to say that we never felt that Mr. Mayne was any paragon of virtue, but we were clutching at straws and hoping that in some way we might accomplish this purpose.

As far as I know, those are the main facts having to do with this sad and difficult tale. I should like to say this much further in general. I believe in a thorough investigation of the activities of any groups in this country which are fundamentally opposed to our constitutional democracy, and particularly if those groups are directed and controlled by a foreign power. Such an investigation is inevitably charged with dynamite. We have examples before us now in all of this debate that has taken place here the last few days of how easy it is to take an association of people and say that because a man made a speech to a certain group that contained certain people that were connected with certain organizations, therefore, that man is some way or another connected with that organization of people. That does not follow. A man ought to be judged by what he says and what he works and strives for, and he ought to be so judged whether his politics are on the right or whether they are on the left. [Applause.] He ought to be so judged even though he be a liberal, even though he be a progressive, even though he be an individual that believes it is necessary to take certain progressive economic steps to solve the problems of America, such as the problem of unemployment or farm tenancy or protection of small competitive business against monopoly.

I wish to say in conclusion that I resent deeply anything that may be said through the spoken or printed word by anybody which implies that because a man believes it is necessary to go forward to the solution of the economic problems of America or because he is concerned with the plight of people, therefore, he is contributing in some way or another to un-American activities and to a coming Communist revolution. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How about a fellow who thinks it is all right to stay where we are? Has he a right to think that, too?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. He certainly does.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I thought so.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I have no more sympathy with calling a man like that a Fascist or a Nazi or a friend of Hitler than I have for accusing a progressive of being a Communist. One result of the Dies committee, if its work is done properly, should be to paint in bold outline exactly what the very essential difference is between progressives and Communists and between conservatives and Fascists.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How about a reactionary?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is different. I reserve the right to call the gentleman a reactionary if he calls me a radical. As long as the gentleman calls me a progressive I will call him a conservative. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, we have a job to do. The Dies committee has a job to do. It is supposed to investigate the kind of subversive activities that I described a moment ago. It ought to stick religiously to that job. As far as I am concerned, I hope it will and will continue to strive to that end. But we, all of us, have a greater duty to perform and that duty is to resolve here and now that we are going to join hands with every person whose fundamental loyalty is to the United States, every person who regardless of his belief would live and die for the preservation of the constitutional democracy of this country, and that we are going to be done with any type of political campaigning on the basis of unsubstantiated accusations or name calling. We have the religious faith of our people, the freedom of ourselves, the opportunity for full development for our children to protect. And we cannot do it if we are divided into suspicious warring camps.

Now, I am taking the wind out of a long speech I wanted to make some day. I am making it now. But I have given you as nearly as I know how an accurate account of these matters, and I hope I may have straightened some of them out. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KRAMER for the balance of this week on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KITCHENS asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the Record.

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein a short article by Raymond Clapper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

GARDNER JACKSON AND THE ATTEMPT TO SMEAR THE DIES COMMITTEE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] on the floor related that testimony before the Dies committee showed that Mr. Mayne testified he had been paid $100 and promised a job in the Department of Agriculture in return for certain documents which he, Mayne, had forged, and the tendency of which was to reflect upon the Dies committee. At that time the majority leader [Mr. RAYBURN] made the statement that the man who "is supposed to have promised him, Mayne, a job in the Department of Agriculture has no official status there."

I assume that the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is correct. That the man to whom reference is made, Gardner Jackson, whom the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] yesterday characterized as "the legislative lobbyist on the Hill for Labor's Nonpartisan League," the political organization created and dominated by John L. Lewis is not now in Government service.

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 28, 1935, at page 1108, I find this statement then made by the gentleman from New York, HAMILTON FISH, on the floor of the House, from which I quote a part as follows:

Mr. Chairman, a week ago I stated in the House that I would present certain evidence that Federal officeholders were contributing to a Communist veterans' organization, with its headquarters in the city of Washington. * * * I have in my pocket photostatic copies of the receipts for these contributions which I will be glad to show to any Member of the House. They were given to me unsolicited * * *. In accordance with the statement I made in the House of Representatives a week ago I am presenting photostatic copies of receipts from donations received by the Veterans Rank and File Committee, signed by Harold Hickerson, a prominent Communist, from Federal officeholders for the purpose of instigating a bonus march of Communists on Washington.

It is my understanding that this organization was staging a bonus march on Washington in opposition to the payment of the bonus.

After giving a number of names, together with the amounts of the contributions, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] continued; I quote:

Another Federal officeholder who contributed to the Veterans' Rank and File Committee is Gardner Jackson, senior administrative counsel, Consumers Division, A. A. A., who made eight separate donations, according to photostatic copies of receipts, dating from September 19, 1934, to December 27, 1934, in sums of $5, with the exception of one donation of $10 on November 12, 1934. It is not surprising to find that Mr. Gardner Jackson is employed as counsel in the Consumers Division of the A. A. A., of which Dr. Frederic Howe, formerly on the National Committee of the A. C. L. U. and correspondent of the Federated Press, which spread revolutionary propaganda through the Communist press, is the chief counsel.

If this statement made in January of '35 by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is accurate—and I have no reason to doubt its correctness—and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] asked me to call the attention of the House to it today, it discloses one of the slimiest sources from which comes the attack on the Dies committee, which is making communism so unpopular in these United States. Knowing the source, we have some measure of the purpose behind the attack.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 7342. An act to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, February 2, 1940, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

H. R. 5789, to amend the present law relating to the delivery of ships' manifests to collectors of customs by excluding Sundays and holidays from the time within which such delivery may be made by the master.

Friday, February 23, 1940:

H. R. 7639, to provide for the examination of civilian nautical schools and for the inspection of vessels used in connection therewith, and for other purposes.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

On Wednesday, February 14, 1940, at 10 a. m., there will be a hearing before the Special Subcommittee on Bankruptcy and Reorganization of the Committee on the Judiciary on the bill (H. R. 8016) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto (municipal compositions). The hearing will be held in room 346, House Office Building.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1348. A letter, from the chairman, District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Board, transmitting the Fourth Annual Report of the District of Columbia Unemployment Board for the calendar year ending December 31, 1939; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

1349. A letter from the president, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting the draft of a proposed bill to amend sections 16 and 17 of chapter II of the act of June 19, 1934, entitled "An act to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

1350. SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1940

The Chaplain, Rev. Zebarny T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Dear Lord and Father of us all, who hast placed within our hands the strands of life, whose issues are eternal: As we bow in prayer before Thee, let Thy calm possess our souls, and may our hearts reflect Thy love as the sleeping sea reflects the sky. May truth be disentangled in our mind, and light shine through its untroubled depth as our restless thoughts give up their fruitless quests. Once more we ask for guidance on our way; and, though we cannot understand the meaning of the shattered hopes of men, the enmity of nations, the destruction of peaceful homes by instruments of death, as we stand again before a lonely cross whereon One died, despised and rejected of men, help us to learn anew that disappointment, pain, and death do not defeat Thy purposes and hold no contradiction of Thy love. Grant unto us, therefore, with heart and mind attuned to the fulfillment of Thy will, that today we may not spurn to do the simple kindly thing, lest this should be the day of Thy visitation and we miss the things belonging to our peace. We ask it in the name of Him for the beauty of whose life we thank Thee, Jesus Christ Thy Son our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 1, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED DURING ADJOURNMENT

Under authority of the order of the 1st instant,

The VICE PRESIDENT announced that, during adjournment of the Senate, he had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 7342) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended, which had been signed previously by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE FOR PAN AMERICAN SANITARY BUREAU

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to extend the franking privilege to the Pan American Sanitary Bureau, together with a report in regard thereto, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORT OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY BOARD

PETITIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Virginia, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House joint resolution to memorialize Congress to reduce excise taxes on tobacco and tobacco products

Whereas the production of tobacco and the manufacture of tobacco products constitute agricultural and industrial activities of major economic importance to the United States and to the Commonwealth of Virginia in particular; and

Whereas the heavy excise taxes imposed by Congress upon manufactured tobacco and tobacco products tend to burden and suppress the industry and thus to result in far-reaching ill effect upon the economy of the Nation, particularly upon that of Virginia and other neighboring Southern States, and especially upon that of farmers engaged in raising tobacco; and

Whereas it is to the interest of the United States, and of the Commonwealth of Virginia in particular, that this depressing influence upon the industry be removed as far as possible and in such a way as to ensure that the farmers engaged in raising tobacco will reap the benefit of such reduction: Now, therefore, be it

1. Resolved by the house of delegates (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to take appropriate action to effect a reduction in the Federal excise taxes upon manufactured tobacco and tobacco products in such manner as to provide that the farmers engaged in the production and marketing of tobacco will receive the benefit of such reduction by way of increased return for their product; be it further

2. Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted by the clerk of the house of delegates to the presiding officers of the United States Senate and of the House of Representatives, respectively, and to each Member of the Virginia delegation in the Congress of the United States.

January 31, 1940: Agreed to by the house of delegates.

E. GRIFFITH DODSON,

Clerk, House of Delegates.

January 31, 1940: Agreed to by the senate.

E. R. COMBS, Clerk of Senate.

The above is a true copy:

E. GRIFFITH DODSON,

Clerk of the House of Delegates.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I present petitions from many distinguished citizens of Vermont, the body of one of which I should like to have printed in the RECORD, and then have the petitions referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. They bear upon a question pending at this time before the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and, without objection, the body of one of the petitions will be printed in the RECORD.

The petition, without the signatures, is as follows:

The Honorable WARREN R. AUSTIN.

The Honorable ERNEST W. GIBSON.

My DEAR SENATORS: Whereas Japan has constantly violated the Kellogg Pact and the Nine Power Treaty, to which both she and the United States are signatory, we, the undersigned, urge you to do all in your power to oppose the renewal of the trade treaty expiring January 26 and to sponsor such legislation as will stop the flow of war supplies to Japan.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, requesting the Department of the Navy to name one of any new battleships under construction or to be constructed in the near future "Rhode Island" in recognition of the outstanding part Rhode Island has played in the establishment and development of the United States Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received, printed in the RECORD under the rule, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution requesting the United States Department of the Navy to name one of any new battleships under construction or to be constructed in the near future "Rhode Island," in recognition of the outstanding part Rhode Island has played in the establishment and development of the United States Navy

Whereas the first official action to establish an American Navy was taken by a Rhode Island General Assembly at its session in Providence, R. I., on the third Monday in August 1775; and

Whereas the first naval force established by the Continental Congress was placed under command of Esek Hopkins, a Rhode Islander, with Rhode Island seamen commanding one-half the total force of the fleet, and this same Esek Hopkins was also the only American naval officer ever to hold the title of commander in chief.

From this beginning of the American Navy to the present time, Rhode Island has played a large part in its development and has furnished to the Navy and to the Nation a long and brilliant line of officers and a large and patriotic force of men.

Oliver Hazard Perry was one of these, whose ringing words, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours," in reporting his famous victory on Lake Erie, September 10, 1813, the first notable success in our second war with Great Britain, have inspired generations of Americans.

Matthew Calbraith Perry was another. He opened Japan to the western world. Under his direction the first steam vessel of the Navy was built and under his command the utility of steam vessels for Navy purposes was proved. He originated the naval apprentice system, represented by the Newport Naval Training Station; developed the present United States Lighthouse Service; and performed other notably outstanding service for the Navy of the United States through war and peace.

Rhode Island has at Newport the finest naval anchorage in America, as well as the first naval torpedo station and the first naval training station for our Navy.

Rhode Island was one of the Original Thirteen English Colonies in America and the first to declare her independence, May 4, 1776.

No battleship of the United States Navy has borne the name of this State since 1907, at which time the citizens of this State presented that Rhode Island with a large silver service. That ship has been ordered out of commission. This silver service is now retained at the Rhode Island State House at Providence waiting opportunity for another presentation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations does hereby respectfully request of the United States Department of the Navy that one of any new battleships under construction, not yet named, or to be constructed in the near future for the United States Navy, shall be named "Rhode Island" in recognition of the brilliant part this State has played in the establishment and development of the United States Navy, and directs the secretary of state to transmit to the Secretary of the Navy a duly certified copy of this resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state to the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States, respectfully requesting them to take all necessary steps to accomplish the purpose of this resolution.

LAND OWNERSHIP

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I wish to read a portion of an editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of January 26, published under the heading "Love of the land":

LOVE OF THE LAND

William C. Bullitt, former Ambassador to Russia, tells this story: He attended a dinner a few years back in Moscow with some of the old Bolsheviks who subsequently were purged—Zinovieff, Kameneff, and Bukharin. They were talking about the early days of bolshevism, when Communist Russia was struggling for its existence. They were conferring with Lenin about the menacing drive of the White Russian armies when he surprised them by saying that he believed the peasants ought to be allowed to own their farms, just as in capitalist countries. Several of the old Bolsheviks present replied: "Oh, no. We couldn't vote for that. It would be contrary to orthodox Marxism."

Whereupon Lenin retorted: "You fools, don't you understand? Let the peasants feel the land; hold it; run it through their hands. Then they will fight for it against the returning landlords, and win. Afterward we can take it away from them and communize it." Which is just what Lenin did. The peasants, fighting for their own land, put up a magnificent battle. The Whites were driven back, and out. The allied expeditionary forces in Siberia were stopped dead. Russia became a great power. Whereupon the farms were collectivized.

The Finnish-Russian war presents a parallel today. The Finns are fighting for their own land. Wise legislation, dating back some years, broke up most of the great Finnish estates and distributed the land among the peasants.

The Russians are fighting for their collectives, and, consequently, fighting with a remarkable lack of zeal.

The love of Americans for the land is one of our great national traits. Witness such plays as Tobacco Road and such motion pictures as The Grapes of Wrath.

Mr. President, I have not as yet read the Grapes of Wrath, though I understand California got the grapes, and Oklahoma got the wrath.

But to speak seriously, love of the land is inherent with mankind. In the springtime it is just as natural for a man to want to dig in the soil as it is for heavy bodies to gravitate toward the center of the earth. There is a strong desire in almost every human soul to own some land. There is nothing that gives quite the feeling of security that the owner of land has when he feels the soil under his feet. There used to be a kind of ceremony when land passed from the ownership of one person to another. This was the sod and twig ceremony in which the new owner was given a piece of sod to feel in his hands and a twig from a tree that grew on the land, as visible attestations of his ownership of the land. The Chinese have long recognized this love of land as indicated in Pearl Buck's famous book, Good Earth.

There is something inspiring and majestic about the feel of ownership. As a man walks on his own soil and gets the feeling that there is something firm and substantial under him, it makes a man of him, willing to die if need be for that small plot of earth, but which is even more important, it makes him willing to live, work, suffer, and sacrifice in order that he may continue to own that land.

This desire to own land is one of the most powerful motivating influences inherent in humanity. Because of it, America was settled in an unbelievably short time. This urge to own land pushed our frontier farther and farther west at a rapid pace. This desire to own land caused pioneers to face the dangers and hardships of frontier life.

The news of the opening of a new frontier spread like wildfire, and almost overnight hordes of land-hungry people were pouring into the new territory. Fifty years ago teeming thousands of land-hungry people waited the signal on the Kansas-Oklahoma border. They waited the signal that would open new land to settlement in the Territory of Oklahoma.

Every one of these new settlers had dreams of an empire and that empire was 160 acres of land, and the ruler of that empire was the settler himself. As these settlers became homesteaders, the feeling of ownership was strong upon them. They became rooted to the soil. They became part of the community. They lived on little and did without much. Their sacrifice was cheerfully made because of the hope of full and complete ownership of that tract of land. No matter whether the soil was rich, fertile alluvial bottom land or whether it was thin, unproductive hill country, that pride of ownership, that feeling of possession was the same. The owner was willing to live heroically in order that he might be lord of all he surveyed so far as that plot of ground was concerned. Yes, he was even willing to die, as many did, in defense of his undisputed ownership of that land.

Show me a community where the inhabitants are not the owners, and I will show you a community that is run down at the heels. But show me a community of home owners, and I will show you a community where the people are interested in schools and churches, and all other civic improvements.

In the pioneer days of America's development, farm ownership was increasing, but today it is decreasing. Forty-two percent of the farmers of America do not own the soil they till. Sixty-one and two-tenths percent of the farmers of Oklahoma do not own the land they farm. It seems that in the light of all of the plain lessons of history, we should recognize the wisdom of allowing our people to own their own farms. If we want to keep the system of private ownership of property in America, we should allow more people an opportunity to own property. Then they will want to retain the system in order to keep their property.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator what he means by saying we should allow people to own land?

Mr. LEE. We should allow them the opportunity. Provide the opportunity for them to own land is a better phrase.

Mr. SMITH. I was merely wondering what was meant by "allow." I know that that is a proper word, but I wanted to hear the Senator's explanation.

Mr. LEE. "Provide" is a better word, and I thank the Senator for his suggestion, because I am sure that he is also desirous that we establish a program which will provide an opportunity for farmers to own the land which they till.

I wish to announce here and now that it is my intention to resist with all the vigor I have any effort to cut down appropriations for the farm program. It is my intention to exert every effort in support of parity payments and a complete soil-conservation program.

It is my firm conviction that the low income of the farmer is the beginning of our economic ills, because when the farmer has money the merchant has a customer and the factory has a market.

Furthermore, we must increase the farmer's income if we are ever to solve the farm-tenant problem. It is of no use to provide means whereby farm tenants can become farm owners unless we increase and stabilize the farmers' income, because they would only lose their farms again.

The security of our Nation itself depends upon the ownership of land by the people, and the ownership of that land depends upon fair farm prices.

The owners of land make the best citizens in times of peace because they have more to live for. The owners of land make the best soldiers in times of war because they have more to die for. It is easy to understand how the gallant, home-owning, home-loving soldiers of Finland have put to rout the poor, ignorant, homeless, landless peasants of Russia. Now is an opportune time for America to take advantage of this dominating incentive to own land and set up a program that will bring the homeless man to the homeless land and not only rehabilitate the abandoned homesteads but rehabilitate the men themselves by providing for them the opportunity to become owners of the soil.

ORDER DISPENSING WITH CALL OF CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The routine morning business is concluded. The calendar under rule VIII is in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it had been hoped that the Senate might proceed today to the consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill; but on account of the unavoidable absence of two or three Members of the Senate who are vitally interested in certain items of the bill it will be impossible to take up the bill today. It is, therefore, my purpose to move that the Senate adjourn until next Tuesday. The National Democratic Committee will be in session in this city on Monday to decide the time and place at which the next President of the United States will be nominated. A number of Senators are members of the National Democratic Committee, and in order that they may attend the meeting of the committee it has been suggested that the Senate not have a session on Monday. In view of the condition of the calendar, I think no time will be lost by adjourning until Tuesday.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has just made a statement—inadvertently, I assume—which is manifestly incorrect. He stated that a meeting of the Democratic National Committee was to be held here in Washington next Monday to decide on the date and meeting place of their convention which would nominate the "next President of the United States." That last clause is incorrect. It is an unwarranted assumption.

Let me remind the Senator that there are two national committees that will meet on different dates here in Washington to decide on a date and place of holding their respective national conventions, the purpose of these meetings being identical. I cannot let his statement go unchallenged.

His wish is father to his thought; but, happily, the people will determine the election.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to say to my friend from New Hampshire that my remark on that subject was not inadvertent, but was deliberate.

Unless there is some further matter to come before the session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Melvin C. Hazen to be Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] asked that that nomination go over. He is not present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Albert M. Rowe to be United States marshal for the northern district of West Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NAVY DEPARTMENT

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lewis Compton to be The Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. MINTON. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the Army be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the Army nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO TUESDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 6, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 2, 1940

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, to whom our lives are bound with ties that death cannot break, Thou who art the God of our fathers, we praise Thy name. For Thy boundless gifts, for friendships near and far, and for the blessed triumphs of the cross we give Thee thanks. We pray that the power of Christian truth may be the inspiration of men, that they may learn contentment and use all things which Thou has created without abusing them. O Thou who art a merciful high priest, touched with a feeling of our infirmities yet without sin, separate our sins from us as far as the east is from the west, for as the heavens are high above the earth, so great is Thy mercy toward them that fear Thee. Let the words of our mouths and the meditations of our hearts be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, our strength and our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 5634. An act granting 6 months' pay to Sidney M. Bowen;

H. R. 5734. An act for the relief of World War sailors and marines who were discharged from the United States Navy or United States Marine Corps because of minority or misrepresentation of age; and

H. R. 6124. An act giving the consent of Congress to the addition of lands to the State of Texas and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain parcels or tracts of land heretofore acquired by the United States of America from the United Mexican States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8067. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 323. An act for the relief of E. C. Beaver, who suffered loss on account of the Lawton, Okla., fire, 1917; and

S. 766. An act for the relief of the Missoula Brewing Co.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills, a joint resolution, and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2346. An act for the relief of Beryl M. McHam;

S. 2992. An act to authorize an exchange of lands between the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad Co. and the United States, at Quantico, Va.;

S. 3012. An act to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Naval Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. 662), relative to the payment of the commuted rations of enlisted men;

S. 3068. An act to provide an additional sum for the payment of a claim under the act entitled "An act to provide for the reimbursement of certain personnel or former personnel of the United States Navy and United States Marine Corps for the value of personal effects destroyed as a result of a fire at the Marine Barracks, Quantico, Va., on October 27, 1938," approved June 19, 1939;

S. 3174. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept, without cost to the United States, a fee-simple conveyance of 16.4 acres, more or less, of land at Floyd Bennett Field in the city and State of New York;

S. 3200. An act to provide for the rank and title of lieutenant general of the Regular Army in the military departments of Panama and Hawaii;

S. J. Res. 71. Joint resolution relating to pay to certain employees of the Government Printing Office for uncompensated leave earned during the fiscal year 1932; and

S. Con. Res. 32. Concurrent resolution authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to make arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States in 1941.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. GIBSON members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agency:

First. Department of Agriculture.

Second. Department of the Interior.

Third. Department of Labor.

Fourth. Department of the Navy.

Fifth. Department of the Treasury.

Sixth. General Accounting Office.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, on Monday next at half past 9 a conference will be held in the House Committee on Agriculture room to which Members representing cotton-growing States are invited. A large group from several States will be up here to discuss the matter of obtaining sufficient funds to carry on control efforts looking to the prevention of an invasion by the pink bollworm into the Cotton Belt.

I sincerely hope that all Members from cotton-growing States will take time out and be on hand Monday morning at 9:30 o'clock in the House Committee on Agriculture room.

[Here the gavel fell.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOEHNE] is indisposed, and I ask unanimous consent of the House that he may be excused from today's session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a United Press dispatch having to do with the withdrawal of the Ambassador of Great Britain from Russia. It is very short.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, needs no defense from me, because his place in the hearts of our farm people is fixed and secure. In the more than 6,000,000 farm homes of America his name is known and honored. In the vast majority of those homes the work he has performed is understood and appreciated. He has made an indelible impression. The President was fortunate, indeed, to find such an able, fearless representative of the farmers of America to preside over the vast number of agencies known as the Department of Agriculture.

In March 1933, when Secretary Wallace took office as a member of the Cabinet, the farmers of America were moving rapidly toward penury and peasantry. In my own section there was an extremely small percentage of the farmers who were solvent. They were hopeless; they were helpless; they knew not which way to turn. We who met in the Congress at that extraordinary session will never forget those conditions we faced—banks gone everywhere; farm-mortgage foreclosures taking place; pitchfork brigades on the roads and gatherings before county courthouses; wheat, 25 cents a bushel; cotton, 5 cents; corn, 10 cents; despair everywhere.

It was under the guidance—it was under the unequalled generalship of Secretary Wallace that the old A. A. A. was passed and put into operation. The plan was thrillingly democratic. Nonpartisan committees were organized from ocean to ocean to carry into effect the laws enacted by that Seventy-third Congress, the first Congress in the history of our country to prove itself a real and wise friend and helper of the tiller of the soil. That original A. A. A. Act was based on the fundamental truth that consumers ought to pay for farm commodities a sufficient amount to give the farmer a reasonable cost of production. Yes; the processing tax was enacted, and no more just or fairer law was ever put upon the statute books. Under it the men who till the acres, who work through long hours, the men who raise the crops, the men who feed the workers in offices and industry have regained hope and courage and confidence in our Government.

When consternation again reigned after the Supreme Court decision of January 1936, the one place to which those of us deeply interested in the farmers' problems could turn for leadership was the office of the Secretary in the Department of Agriculture. It is to be regretted that a reactionary Supreme Court gave such a setback and dealt a blow almost fatal to the movement to keep agricultural America from sinking to peasantry.

The great Secretary pointed the way to the conservation program, which was soon enacted. The Conservation Act, unfortunately, calls for a direct appropriation from the Treasury, and it is probable that, through the years, such contribution from the National Treasury must be made in order to conserve the soil and the resources of America. Such appropriation is wholly justified, as are appropriations to protect and conserve the rivers, harbors, and forests. In all this struggle for economic stability and for justice the leader was the Secretary of Agriculture, who never lost faith.

When the Congress saw fit to make an appropriation for partial parity payments on leading agricultural commodities, the Secretary of Agriculture again led the way and arranged the distribution of appropriated funds. With all the millions of dollars that have gone out of the Treasury of the United States to the farm homes of our land—payments ranging from a few dollars to many hundreds—there never has been a question of scandal raised. The committees which have made the distribution have been nonpartisan, selected without reference to their religion or their politics. The success has been due to the management and high character of Henry A. Wallace, the greatest Secretary of Agriculture that America has ever seen, the strongest and wisest friend of the farmer ever to fill that high position.

It is to be regretted that any minor incident or any remark made in the heat of the battle to maintain farm security should have been seized upon as a basis for criticism, by one of the ablest men of this House to whom we look for leadership in appropriation matters. I think it is true that if a blow is dealt our agricultural population at this time and by this House, it will be bitterly resented and that resentment will be shown in the good old American method—by the vote. Fear of an adverse vote should not and will not be the determining factor in our action. I feel most deeply that, in seeking to hold important appropriations for agriculture we are but doing justice and giving permanence and stability to the most valuable program initiated by our Government. Cessation of these activities will be unwise and extravagant because the program, if discontinued through false economy, must be revived. What will the Nation think of an economy program beginning and ending with the farmer?

Secretary Wallace will be remembered as a man who put farm welfare above party allegiance. Can we not all do the same and now demonstrate our sincere and deep concern for those struggling to maintain our basic and fundamental industry—agriculture? [Applause.]

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON WORLD WAR VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the veterans of the World War who are Members of the House that tomorrow morning we are going to have the national commanders of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and other veterans' organizations with us in the World War Veterans' Committee room, 356 old House Office Building.

I wish to invite the World War veterans who are Members of the House to come over and meet these commanders at 10 o'clock tomorrow, Saturday, morning.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THORKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record, and to include excerpts from the origin of the Balfour declaration, and from a book entitled "Democracy and the World Dominions."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record in regard to the Bonneville project, and to include therein a brief statement from the United States News.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, on day before yesterday I made some remarks that were predicated on a table furnished me by the State Department and, inadvertently, I failed to include that in the remarks as published in the Record. I therefore ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks may be reprinted and the table inserted in order that the remarks may be reasonably intelligible.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record, and to include two speeches made at the dedication of the Madison (Conn.) Post Office last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House. A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 16]

Allen, Pa.	Cole, N. Y.	Fay	Holmes
Anderson, Mo.	Culkin	Fernandez	Hook
Barry	Darden	Fish	Jarrett

Murdock, Utah	Schwert	Stearns, N. H.	Winter
Myers	Secrest	Sullivan
Pfeifer	Sheridan	Sweeney
Reece, Tenn.	Smith, Ill.	Taylor

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-one Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include two certain tables which I have prepared myself and one brief table from the Treasury report of the United States Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LEMKE was granted permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8202) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8202, with Mr. COLE of Maryland in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Phony peach and peach mosaic eradication: For determining and applying such methods of eradication, control, and prevention of spread of the diseases of peach trees known as phony peach and peach mosaic as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary, including cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations of growers, or individuals, as he may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, including the certification of products out of the infested areas to meet the requirements of State quarantines, $89,800: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the cost or value of trees or other property injured or destroyed.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday my very good friend the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], in addressing the House, made this statement, referring to the Appropriations Committee and its action on the Department of Agriculture bill:

The committee is apparently now dominated by the ideas of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].—

And so forth. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish I might accept the compliment paid to me by my good friend from North Carolina and take credit for the serious effort which the Appropriations Committee is putting forth in trying to reduce appropriations.

Let me say this: The Appropriations Committee is the servant of the House. It has taken no action and can take no action that is not subject to review by this body and change at your pleasure. I certainly speak for myself, and I believe I speak for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], in saying that I have always accepted, I hope with good grace, whatever the ultimate judgment of the House may be on any action taken by our committee. But if the Appropriations Committee is trying to cut down expenditures, trying to balance the Federal Budget, trying to save the financial structure of our Nation, let us see whose idea it is.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I only have 5 minutes, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia, if, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, he does not feel and believe that it is the duty of this committee to try to carry into effect the action of this Congress—the expressed will of this Congress in legislation passed?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It always does that without exception.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Now, I will ask my friend if the Appropriations Committee has not ignored the express will of Congress, namely, that the farmers of this country should have parity, or that an effort should be made to give the farmer parity for his products, and if this committee has not deliberately ignored and tried to set aside that legislative mandate and action of this Congress?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, that is a splendid question. May I have 5 additional minutes, because I want to try to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia that he may have 5 additional minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Now, my distinguished and learned friend asks a very proper and a very pertinent question. The answer to that question is "No."

The gentleman asked me whether the committee, in not giving the farmer parity, had not ignored the action of Congress. I say to you that the Congress last session, in overriding the action of the Appropriations Committee, and writing parity appropriations into the law, when they did not raise the taxes as the 1938 agricultural bill required them to do, took action over and above the Budget and against the recommendation of the President of the United States. The 1938 agricultural bill, for which I voted, provides a system by which parity may be put into effect, but it also provides that if and when that is called into effect the Congress should levy a processing tax or some sort of a tax to raise the revenue.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Agricultural Adjustment Act conveys language of that kind?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I did not mean to state just that. I said the act provided for parity, which the President signed. The President signed it with reservations, and he said if parity was to be put into effect we ought to raise the required funds by new taxes. Last year we put in parity, and we did not raise the taxes.

Now, if the gentleman is thinking that by not bringing in funds for parity we ignored the law, I will say that funds for parity was not recommended by the Budget this year to the Congress. We had no Budget estimate for parity payments, and, as I understand, that is not involved here now. But on the farm-tenancy question the Appropriations Committee did not bring in the item of $25,000,000.

Let me say this to you: There are some several billions of dollars' worth of authorizations which this Congress has made that the Appropriations Committee has never brought in appropriations for. If we would bring in to you an appropriation bill providing for everything that Congress has authorized, then there would be chaos and confusion.

Now, before the time runs on me, I want to go back to the proposition which I took the floor to speak about. Whose idea is it that we ought to try to cut down public expenditures and put reason and logic and sanity into our appropriation work? I want to read what the President of the United States said about the subject, speaking of deficit financing and unbalanced budgets:

With the utmost seriousness I point out to the Congress the profound effect of this fact upon our national economy. It has contributed to the recent collapse of our banking structure. It has accentuated the stagnation of the economic life of our people. It has added to the ranks of the unemployed. Our Government's house is not in order, and for many reasons no effective action has been taken to restore it to order.

Upon the unimpaired credit of the United States Government rest the safety of deposits, the security of insurance policies, the activity of industrial enterprises, the value of our agricultural products, and the availability of employment. The credit of the United States Government definitely affects these fundamental human values. It therefore becomes our first concern to make secure the foundation. National recovery depends upon it.

Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid the danger.

It is too late for a leisurely approach to this problem. We must not wait to act several months hence. The emergency is accentuated by the necessity of meeting great refunding operations this spring.

We must move with a direct and resolute purpose now. The Members of the Congress and I are pledged to immediate economy.

Mr. KELLER. What was the date of that speech?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The date of that was 7 years ago.

Mr. KELLER. Oh, I see.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. What was true 7 years ago is doubly true now, because the national debt is higher. We are up against the ceiling of the national debt. The President of the United States recognizes that it is true, because he has brought a Budget here and asked the Congress to help him to reduce the deficit this year $2,000,000,000. The President knows it is necessary to do this. If it was true in 1933 that an unimpaired credit of this Nation was the lifeblood of the Nation, it is still true in 1940. The effort to reduce expenditures now being attempted by the Appropriations Committee of this House, whatever may be your ultimate pleasure, is certainly the action we are taking in line with every pledge and every policy that our party, which is in power, has given to the American people in the last 7 years.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes; I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman made the statement on yesterday that in 1933, when we were in the very depths of the depression, appropriations for the farm program were about $500,000,000. In this bill the committee brings in $1,185,115,315. In view of this, regardless of what conditions are, I do not believe the committee should be subject to criticism or charged with stinginess.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I do not believe there is a Member of this House who does not want to do all that he can to help this situation. The Budget for relief is cut almost 50 percent. That will come a little later. The President's Budget calls for $1,125,000,000 as against $1,475,000,000 for the current fiscal year. In view of this it is not right to say that all the cut is being put upon agriculture. There have been no cuts in this bill that are going to seriously affect the fundamental problem of agriculture we ought to be dealing with, and that is to try to put agriculture on an economically sound basis.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to my colleague from Virginia.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. As I recall, the gentleman stated that the Agricultural Adjustment Act provides that in the event Congress makes appropriation for parity payments, the revenue shall be raised by a processing tax.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; I did not mean to say that if I said it. My recollection is that the President said that when he signed the bill.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. But that is not in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman is correct. My recollection is that the President hesitated about signing that bill and that when he did sign it he did so with the statement that if parity was called into effect it should be provided for by taxation; and that it was stated last year by the President in press conferences that if Congress provided parity they ought to provide a tax to take care of it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Barberry eradication: For the eradication of the common barberry and for applying such other methods of eradication, control, and prevention of spread of cereal rusts as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture may be necessary to accomplish such purposes, $150,000: Provided, That, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, no expenditures from this appropriation shall be made for these purposes until a sum or sums at least equal to such expenditures shall have been appropriated, subscribed, or contributed by States, counties, or local authorities, or by individuals or organizations for the accomplishment of such purposes: Provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the cost or value of property injured or destroyed.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia and the members of this committee to the fact that immediately after the message from which he quoted was written, the President of the United States signed a bill appropriating $4,800,000,000, because when he had analyzed the situation facing this country he knew it was necessary to do that. He has gone on doing that and he has pointed out that we are in no danger from lack of balancing our Budget at all. He pointed out what I have been saying over and over again in this House that at the end of the Civil War this country owed 17½ percent of its total national wealth. At the present time it owes less than 9 percent. Yet we paid that 17½ percent without difficulty; and if we had to pay three times 17½ today, we could do it as easily as we paid the original 17½, because at the present moment every man in America when he is at work is producing three times as much wealth as his ancestors were doing at the time of the Civil War. Therefore we can produce just three times the amount of wealth now that we could then.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. When does the gentleman propose that we begin to pay up on the debt?

Mr. KELLER. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. I am going to answer it for him. Our national income had fallen below $40,000,000,000 for the calendar year 1933.

We had fallen at that time below $40,000,000,000. By Government spending for public improvements the national income began to go up and up and up. For 3½ years, by making appropriations from the National Treasury, we kept on until we reached a national income of nearly $70,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1937.

Mr. TABER. Was that a good time to begin cutting?

Mr. KELLER. If we had known enough to have gone on and increased expenditures, instead of cutting them to the bone, as we did in 1936, which brought on the recession of 1937, we could have brought our national income up to $100,000,000,000 a year within the next 3 years. With our present rate of taxation we could then take $5,000,000,000 a year—sufficient to keep every man at work and at the same time begin paying off what we owe. At the same time, I repeat, we could keep every man at work in the United States who wants to work. That is what we are going to do when we open our eyes to the facts.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. May I say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that you are never going to even begin to balance the Budget until you restore the purchasing power of the American farmer.

Mr. KELLER. That is true.

Mr. TABER. And you are not going to restore purchasing power until you balance the Budget.

Mr. RANKIN. You never have restored anybody's purchasing power by balancing the National Budget; you must restore his purchasing power first.

Mr. TABER. Oh, yes; we have.

Mr. RANKIN. If you are going to balance the Budget, you have first got to restore the purchasing power of the American farmer by raising the prices of the farmers' crops.

Mr. KELLER. You can only restore purchasing power by raising the national income. That is where we are making our great mistake. We have to raise our national income. That is the only solution of the question. Any man who studies the matter seriously will agree with that statement.

Mr. SCHAFFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFFER of Wisconsin. Is the gentleman endeavoring to increase our national income in this manner? Should the Federal Government go into bankruptcy and into inflation, the national annual income will be many hundred billion dollars, as it was in Germany during inflation.

Mr. KELLER. If the gentleman had listened to what I said in reference to percentage of our indebtedness at the end of the Civil War, he would know a better answer than he asks for, because he can think when he really tries real hard to do so. All we have to do is raise our national income. Taxes do not hurt anybody when money is being made. It is the fellows who do not have money with which to pay taxes who get hurt. Whenever they are making money, you do not hear anything about paying taxes. I am going to present this entire subject in an address in the near future and submit the official figures in support of my position in this whole matter.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in seeing the Members of the House so interested in raising the national income. I want to quote from a speech made by the President of the United States on October 19, 1932, at Pittsburgh in Pennsylvania, and I might add that the President made many fine prelection pledges to the American people and he uttered some statements that should be reiterated today by him and should be heeded by him and by the Congress.

I quote from the President's speech:

The credit of the family depends chiefly upon whether that family is living within its income. And that is equally true of the Nation. If the Nation is living within its income, its credit is good.

If Government lives beyond its income for a year or two, it can usually borrow temporarily at reasonable rates. But if, like a spendthrift, it throws discretion to the winds and is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending; if it extends its taxing to the limit of the people's power to pay and continues to pile up deficits, then it is on the road to bankruptcy.

No truer statements were ever made by any man. It is very discouraging, it seems to me, to have Members of Congress get up here and say that all we have to do is spend, spend, spend, but I want to tell you that a man who says that never had a dollar of his own that he could pile up to pay any obligations he was going to have to meet, because after a while he would be just one step ahead of the sheriff and then pretty soon the sheriff would get him. The Members of Congress who are always talking about spend, spend, spend, never met a pay roll.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICH. I do not have time.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest since he has thrown that accusation at me, that the gentleman is entirely mistaken. I have gone out and made more money than the gentleman ever did, and that money was not given to me, and I always met my pay rolls.

Mr. RICH. I am glad of that. We talk in such large figures here that it almost paralyzes me. I should like to see the gentleman's pay roll and I should like to see some of that money he has. I am sure I am not in that class and it would be nice to look in on such a large amount of money. I am sure I never have had any quantity of money given to me.

Mr. KELLER. I can show it to the gentleman.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will pay his share of the Government's debt, that is all right. And he should for I believe the more a man makes the more he should pay for Government upkeep.

Mr. KELLER. I am doing it.

Mr. RICH. The trouble is that the poor fellow does not have anything, and he is the fellow we are trying to help now. We want to equalize our wealth on merit and in a sound manner.

I have heard some Members of Congress in the last 2 or 3 years say that we do not intend to pay the national debt. I have heard men that have spoken on the floor of the House today make that very statement. I tell you it is a pretty serious situation in which we find ourselves when Members of Congress say we do not intend to pay our national debt.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Would the gentleman suggest that our distinguished colleague from Illinois might be made Secretary of the Treasury so he could put into operation some of the wonderful policies by which he did so well?

Mr. KELLER. That might be a good suggestion.

Mr. RICH. It would be a good thing to have somebody in the Treasury that would stop the spending. The gentleman from Illinois would be a misfit in my judgment as Secretary of the Treasury; he wants to spend, spend, spend. What are we doing for the farmers? That is our problem now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I shall not yield any more now. If the gentleman will get me more time, then I shall yield.

What are you doing for the farmers? I want to help the farmers. I am interested in the farmers in Pennsylvania and in the Nation. Let me show you the way we have been operating the Department of Agriculture and what we have spent since 1932 for agriculture.

In 1932 we appropriated $102,207,029. In 1933, $185,290,670; 1934, $504,438,295; 1935, $857,152,312; 1936, $656,806,055—just watch the agriculture appropriation grow—1937, $669,580,887; 1938, $693,241,142; 1939, $1,161,987,200; 1940, $1,274,582,302.

In 9 years the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture have increased over 1,200 percent.

What are we doing for the farmers of this country? Let me tell you that if you get the leeches off the Department of Agriculture that are sucking away from the farmers the money that we appropriate, and if you give the money to the farmers, you will be doing better. The trouble is you have too many hangers-on in the Department of Agriculture. Let us take care of the farmer who farms and not the politician who is paid the money the farmer should get. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, I am not used to dealing in high finance like the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Pennsylvania and, therefore, I am speaking about an item involving a comparatively small amount of money, namely, the restoration of the farm purchase item of $25,000,000, under the farm-tenancy program.

Something was said the other day about a program that was instituted some years ago in South Dakota, and I wish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], if he is present, to listen to what I have to say on this subject. I have made some investigation of the matter and I find that in South Dakota they did not have in truth and in fact a farm-purchase program. They put on a program in that State largely for the purpose of bailing out some banks and some finance companies. A good part of the money was spent for purposes other than the purchase of farms. The treasurer of the institution absconded with some $235,000 of the company's money, and this is a matter of record. I wish to call attention to this further difference, that that program provided for an interest rate of from 5½ to 6 percent and provided that the time for repayment should be from 5 to 30 years, whereas under the present program the interest rate is 3 percent and the time for repayment is 40 years.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTH. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman has given a good deal of thought to this subject. The statement was made by someone yesterday in debate that these farm tenants, after the Government has bought farms for them and set them up and given them special training, are self-sustaining. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. SOUTH. Absolutely, as it applies to the present program, but not the South Dakota case to which I referred.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes. After the farm tenant has bought the farm, the Government sets him up and gives him special training and instruction, and then he is self-sustaining?

Mr. SOUTH. Yes; and I can substantiate that statement.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. If that is true and if the Government can take a farm tenant who has bought such land and make him self-sustaining, why can they not take the same farmer who already owns the land and make him self-sustaining?

Mr. SOUTH. If the gentleman will listen to my reply—does the gentleman want the information, or did he just want to take up my time?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; I did not want to take up the gentleman's time.

Mr. SOUTH. As proof that it is self-sustaining, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia there is now only 2-percent delinquency. As further proof that it is self-sustaining, those farmers have paid back to the Government 50 percent more than is due; many of them are several payments ahead. Does the gentleman challenge either of these statements?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is with respect to payment for the land, but I am talking about what he can do after he gets the land. Are you setting him up in a business where he can sustain himself?

Mr. SOUTH. The best answer, I will say to the gentleman, is the fact that he is doing it. There is now only 2 percent delinquency and they have now paid back into the Treasury more than 50 percent in excess of what is due.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Will the gentleman now answer my question? If the farm tenant can make a living for himself on the farm after the Government has trained him, why cannot the people who already own farms be given that secret formula whereby they can be made self-sustaining?

Mr. SOUTH. If the gentleman will get me more time, I will attempt to enlighten him on that; but I want to say again that the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and the fact they are paying it back demonstrates beyond any reasonable doubt that they can pay it back.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTH. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I think one answer to the question of the gentleman from Virginia is that these local committees, that are organized for the purpose of handling the administration of these farms and in selecting the tenants, select the best tenant they can find to turn these farms over to.

Mr. SOUTH. That is right.

Mr. TERRY. And in that way they get a very superior class of tenant farmers.

Mr. SOUTH. That is correct.

Mr. TERRY. It seems to me that is one answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTH. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would like to make just this statement: A good many of the farmers have been self-sustaining, but the trouble is that the interest rates have been high and there have been a lot of accumulated charges; but even if the gentleman's statement were true, according to his argument, we ought to abolish the R. F. C., which makes loans to business, when it has protection of the tariff, the burden of which the farmer carries.

Mr. SOUTH. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the observation made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] is valuable in this connection, but I want to call the attention of the Members to the fact that the appropriations that are being made here for agriculture are for the cotton farmers, the wheat farmers, and so on. As I understand it, under this tenancy program, they are setting up men to carry on diversified farming and, as you say, on good land, and they are taking them off of relief and making them self-sustaining. Is not that the distinction?

Mr. SOUTH. That is absolutely correct.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTH. I will have to decline to yield just at this time. I hope I shall have time to yield later. I want to make this brief statement in connection with what the distinguished gentleman from Virginia said yesterday. It is not necessary for me to say to this House that the gentleman from Virginia is one of the ablest and one of the most valuable Members of this Congress. He goes wrong here sometimes, just like the rest of us, as he has done in this case, I think, because he becomes so imbued with the necessity of balancing the Budget that he forgets some of the fundamental problems that this Congress is dealing with and some of the fundamental problems that the Government is going to have to meet; and I may say to my good friend that the remarks he made yesterday, in effect, that the farm program is a failure, is as good a springboard as the Republicans need or want to launch the attack which they are going to make upon the Democratic Party in the coming campaign. He did not make it for that purpose, but, most assuredly, it will serve that purpose and serve it well.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to correct the gentleman. I did not make any such statement as that.

Mr. SOUTH. I do not want to be unfair to the gentleman, and if he did not make it, then, of course, this does not apply. You had as well say that because there are patients in the Walter Reed Hospital who have been there 15 years and are still sick men, we should go in and tear down the building, discharge the doctors and the nurses, and do away with the medicine. Why? Because the patients who have been treated there are still sick. However, I submit to you that that would be harsh, that that would be cruel, that that would be inhuman, that that would be unwise, and that that would be unsound.

I say to my friends who are attacking the farm program simply because it has not done everything we would like to have it do, you are not justified in saying it has failed. Neither should you seek to tear down and do away with what we have done.

I want to say to my friends on the Republican side of the aisle that your party in the platform of 1936 had this to say:

The farm problem is an economic and social, not partisan, problem, and we propose to treat it accordingly.

Well, the votes here will answer whether that is being done or not. And further:

We propose to provide for ample farm credit at rates as low as those enjoyed by other industries, including commodity and livestock loans, and preference in land loans to farmers acquiring or refinancing a home.

I want to talk about the farmer that you are going to help acquire a home. This little item of $25,000,000 is not a gift. It is a loan bearing 3 percent interest. Will it be paid back? Yes. The figures now show that there is 2 percent delinquency. Do you know of any group of borrowers with a record better than that? I say to you that in my section of the country, although there are only a few men benefited by it, the county committees select men known to be progressive. They examine their credit rating. They examine the farming they have been doing. They have their health examined. Therefore, they are able to select the very best men. Those men can, will, and are, paying for their homes. But you say, "It is slow." Of course it is slow. Let me say to my Democratic colleagues one of the mistakes we have made in this Congress during recent years in trying to deal with the economic problem with which we are faced is that we have tried to move too rapidly. We have not been satisfied with a proposition that is fundamentally and basically sound if it requires a little time to do the job. We have tried to reach up into thin air and snatch down some panacea, some cure-all, that will do the job next week.

I submit to you that of all the money the Federal Government has spent in trying to rehabilitate the farmers of this Nation, the soundest and most satisfactory item is this little item involving $25,000,000 to lend to the farmers. It ought to be continued. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I simply rise to make this observation, that in this program the most intelligent agricultural minds of the Nation have, in a measure, control over the tenants and their farming agenda, whereas with the farmers who are not in the program, all that can be done is to give them advice, which they need not follow unless they care to do so, and which they, notoriously, have failed to follow. That, I think, is the answer to the question asked by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum]. We can show the way. We can advise all farmers to take it, but if they do not care to, then their blood must be upon their own heads. But in this program, after these tenants have been rehabilitated, there is a measure of control, and that advice must be followed, or else they go off of the program. Therefore they are self-sustaining, because they follow expert advice and the best farming practices.

The point may be illustrated from the observation of each one of us in the rearing of children. Take children to church and the preacher will give them the best advice possible. Some will heed, most will not. But when you have wise, prudent, moral parents in the home, they can see to it that the children follow moral admonition to some extent, and the children's conduct will reflect parental precept and example, because it is backed by parental authority. This program succeeds because of its parent-like interest in, and authority over, the carefully selected beneficiaries.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I yield gladly to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Is it not also true that these farm tenants, being a selected class of tenants, have been getting parity and the other payments that are taken out of this present bill, and that helps them to be economically sound and pay their debts because they have been getting these things?

Mr. HOBBS. Certainly.

Now, just this one word further and I will yield back the balance of my time. It seems to me that the problem here casts the burden upon the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Woodrum] and those who follow his school of thought. They should preach to the farmers of America who are not in this program, and who may not be self-sustaining, that they follow the enlightened plan which has been worked out for these tenants and under which these tenants are making good. Our problem is not to progress by coming to a sudden, dead stop, but to go on with this intelligent program which is succeeding, and let the gentleman from Virginia educate the other farmers, who he says are not self-sustaining, to emulate the example of these who are succeeding in making farming pay.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. Does not the gentleman think it would be disastrous to absolutely abolish this program, now that the machinery has been set up to carry it on; and would it not make it extremely difficult at some future time when we have more money, if that time ever comes, to go back and reinstate it, because they would say it has failed and has been abandoned? As a matter of fact, it has not failed, has it?

Mr. HOBBS. It has succeeded more abundantly than even the advocacy of its authors had prophesied. The gentleman is correct in his thought that it would be far more difficult to reinstate this program than to continue it.

Not only has its wisdom been justified, but it is not costing the Federal Treasury or the taxpayers of America one dime. If you can show me a better investment, one that tops this investment, then there is not a dog in Georgia or a flea on one in Alabama. [Laughter.] This self-liquidating investment builds character and patriotism.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. Certainly.

Mr. SOUTH. In a united movement to cut down expenses, the friends of this item have agreed to take a cut of $15,000,000. It was $40,000,000 last year. We ask for only $25,000,000 this year. This represents a substantial cut and, I submit, as great a cut as we ought to be asked to take.

Mr. HOBBS. Certainly; that is true.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I shall be happy to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am interested in getting the gentleman's view on this thought: To what degree does the gentleman attribute the success of these rehabilitated tenant farmers to the close supervision of these families that is exercised in educating them, in training them, in coaching them, and encouraging them?

Mr. HOBBS. I would say 50 percent, and the other 50 percent is attributable to careful selection of the beneficiaries, plus a wise, balanced farming program.

Mr. CRAWFORD. For the particular family?

Mr. HOBBS. Which is worked out not only for the particular family but for any family who wants to make a living on a farm.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What I mean by family is the family in a given locality.

Mr. HOBBS. That is right.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say just one word in reference to a statement made by my good friend, the gentleman from Virginia. I have great admiration for him, but he states some very striking things sometimes that do not always bear analyzing. He inquired: Why finance the purchase of homes when some of the farmers who already have homes cannot make a go of it? I answer the gentleman's question by hurling a question back at him: Why should the R. F. C. lend billions of dollars to industry when present industry cannot get along without it? It is important sometimes in an emergency to do financing, it is important for some industries to be financed which cannot otherwise be financed. Some farmers are making a go of it. Other agencies are making loans to farmers whose credit is good, who can buy the necessary supplies to carry them along, but this is more, much more, than simply the financing of the current operation of a farm; it is the financing of a method by which he may gain a home. If there is any man here who has visited, as I have, some of the counties where these farm tenant operations are going on, I would like for him to stand up, if he says they are not successful. Here is my good friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Gilchrist], who just recently went to some of these projects in one county in Iowa. He said he was surprised at the success which the program is making. Am I correct? I ask my colleague.

Mr. GILCHRIST. That is quite true.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has anybody else actually visited the operations where they are making home owners which will contribute so much to the stability of this Nation? Who says that he has visited such a project and found it not successful? Let him stand up and say where it is.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, my greatest objection to this program today, as it has been from the beginning, is the fact that if it is to be comprehensive it has to be on such a large scale that the Federal Treasury could not stand the drain. It is true there are 3 of these rehabilitated tenant farmers in my district, but there are only 21 in the entire State of Kansas.

The harm this program does is that while it helps these few isolated individuals, it is only tantalizing to the many thousands in equal need who are not helped. They see the few favored over themselves; they feel and know that given like opportunities they could have like success, yet they realize the hopelessness of their own situation.

To carry out this program on a scale sufficient to come anywhere near solving the problem would take many billions of dollars, and we know this money is not available and cannot be made available. If we cannot extend the benefits of this program in some degree to all who need it and can qualify for its benefits, we should stop. Let us treat all alike. The results to be attained by the program carried out on the scale as it has been are not sufficient to be more than tantalizing to those who cannot enjoy its benefits.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. The gentleman does not contend, does he, that it is going to cost the Government any money to carry on this program?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. If it is going to be comprehensive and extended, it certainly will cost the Government a large sum of money.

Mr. SOUTH. Are not the farmers paying it back?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. They get all the other benefits, too—soil-conservation payments, parity payments—they are getting all the other benefits the rest of the farmers get, and this in addition. As I say, the present program is not sufficiently extensive to be more than tantalizing to those tenant farmers who cannot be benefited. To pick out a man here and another man 100 miles away to receive these benefits seems to me a bad policy.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. Whose fault is it that the amount of money is not larger? Is it not the fault of the farmers or those who originated the program. Why was it not launched on a larger scale?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. This is a project that was started when we were panacea-minded.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. We have heard that these things were paying back large amounts. The total appropriations have been somewhere around fifty or sixty million dollars. The collections, appearing on page 963, have been $150,319.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. The gentleman does not contend that the statement made a while ago that there has been more money paid back into the Treasury than actually due is not a correct statement?

Mr. TABER. The amount due was $94,278, and the amount paid back was $150,319, as against fifty to sixty million dollars expended. That does not mean much.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Now, the gentleman is too well informed to make such a statement.

Mr. TABER. No.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Those figures were for the first 2 years. The $40,000,000 appropriated last year is not included in that report; so it is not fifty or sixty million dollars. It was $10,000,000 the first year and $25,000,000 the second year.

Mr. TABER. The collections through 1939 are in there.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The last $40,000,000 is not included.

Mr. TABER. Well, only $35,000,000 as against $150,000,

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman said fifty or sixty million dollars. He is on the Appropriations Committee and I am sure wants to stick to the facts.

Mr. SOUTH. According to the gentleman's own statement, more has been paid back than is due.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman approves of the rural free delivery mail, does he not?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The first appropriation was $10,000; the second year's appropriation was so small they did not carry on at all; and the third appropriation was $30,000. It took them 4 years to get 82 routes established.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. And everybody is getting their mail now. If every tenant gets this, where are we going to be? We all get the mail now.

Mr. JONES of Texas. No. If the program keeps up as at present outlined it will not cost the Government one cent. If it does cost anything, it will be very little.

Mr. SOUTH. I want to emphasize the fact that the gentleman from New York stated that more has been paid back than is due. These loans run for 40 years. The gentleman would not expect it all to be paid back at this time, would he? [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike out the last half dozen words.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] was speaking, I injected myself into the discussion. I want to take a minute or two to explain myself more fully. I stated at that time I feared the gentleman from Texas because of his great ability as a pleader. He pleads so emotionally for the farmers that I often am inclined to reach for my handkerchief. If he represented my industrial district, and if he should take the floor for those people, with his appealing power, we would need two handkerchiefs.

The point I wanted to bring out the other day was the same as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] just presented. In spite of the fact a few people were interviewed and said they did not feel tantalized, as the gentleman from Kansas put it, because one of their neighbors had been so especially favored, anyone knows that when you pick out one particular family as a favorite selection you must make hundreds of others dissatisfied. Human nature cannot be pictured to me any other way. Of course, that particular family succeeds. It is so carefully selected. Only the ones that are sure to succeed are approved. This family is furnished with real supervision from the Agricultural Department. The county and Federal agents will always be at his doorstep to advise him. A renewal will always be granted if he is behind. They will seldom be in default. The program must of necessity be successful. That is the method this administration has also adopted in connection with other matters. They have been simply renewed or carried along and no defaults claimed. The truth of failure will not be known for a long time. If you think I do not sympathize with the farm-tenant situation, I am sorry, but it is utterly ridiculous to tell me that you can pick out a favorite family, give them $5,000, let hundreds of others watch that proceeding, and claim they will not be dissatisfied. The picture drawn was that if we wanted to stop communism in this Nation, we had better adopt this program. If you make one satisfied customer and tantalize hundreds of others, we will not make any such progress.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Can the gentleman give me the name of any farmer in the United States who has been tantalized because of the farm-tenancy program, which has been successful?

Mr. GIFFORD. Of course, I cannot. There are no such favorites in my district that I know of.

Mr. GILCHRIST. No; the gentleman cannot.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am simply using the only common-sense judgment I have; that is all. You cannot convince me that because you have interviewed three or four families, human nature is not exactly as I have pictured it. In any event, why make a favorite of 1 family, or 21 favorites, in the whole State of Kansas? From my viewpoint, the gentleman from Kansas is right. That is the real objection I have. I think all citizens should be treated alike. In connection with everything else we have done, all have had equal opportunity to qualify. Here you have only 1 particular family selected by some special committee. That is favoritism in the highest possible degree, which this Nation has tried to avoid in the past.

I rose to state, and I want to make it emphatic, if the gentleman from Texas could only represent my people, how appealing he could be. I think he could get quite a little for us from the Treasury.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HILL. Would the gentleman be willing, then, to vote for an appropriation to take care of all of them? We want this appropriation for only a few. Would the gentleman vote for an appropriation large enough to take care of all of them? All of this money will be paid back.

Mr. GIFFORD. I must vote "no," because we have not any money. I might vote for it if we had the money. I might vote for a large appropriation where everybody could compete on a sort of civil-service examination. Some sort of plan should prevail that all have equal opportunity of receiving any benefits from the General Treasury.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, all this debate is very interesting and all of it pertains to the bill, but none of it is in order. I would not want to have to make the point of order and insist that the gentleman moving to strike out the last word speak to the amendment, but time is moving along, it is getting toward 2 o'clock now, and we would like to dispose of this bill this afternoon. May I earnestly suggest that Members not speak on pro forma amendments? We shall be glad to have you take all the time you need on legitimate amendments, but we should appreciate it if you will let us get along as rapidly as possible now and confine remarks to the pending amendment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman give us some idea when the farm-tenant amendment will be up for consideration?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is one of the last amendments in the bill.

May I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk read?

The Clerk read as follows:

Pink bollworm and Thurberia weevil control: For the control and prevention of spread of the Thurberia weevil and the pink bollworm, including the establishment of such cotton-free areas as may be necessary to stamp out any infestation, and for necessary surveys and control operations in Mexico in cooperation with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities, $526,800.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KLEBERG: On page 56, line 2, after the word "authorities", strike out "$526,800" and insert "$1,326,800."

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I feel very much like a south Texas cowboy who back in 1916 one afternoon when the day's work was over went into town with others of the camp. One of them, walking across a plaza in front of the courthouse, raised his voice in a cheerful cowboy yell, "Yip-yip-yow! I am a wolf with a barbed-wire tail and this is my night to howl." At about that time about 7 feet of ex-Texas Ranger, at that time chief of police, slapped his hand on the cowboy's shoulder and said, "You will have to do your howling in jail." Just at that moment the cowboy to whom I liken myself let out just a little bit of a yip. The sheriff whirled and caught him by the shoulder and said, "What kind of a wolf are you, my friend?" He looked up at the sheriff and said, "Me? I'm just a little old coyote."

So I feel very much like that cowboy in confronting the great mental genius, the lung power, and other evidences of interest that have been shown here, with one side defending economies and another side insisting on greater expenditures, while here I come with a little amendment asking for $800,000 additional for the purpose of exterminating a little bug—a bug so light, so feathery, so flimsy, and so helpless that it does not even have the means of directing its own flight. When it emerges into the moth stage it must wait for some passing breeze or wind to waft it on its way.

Despite the fact that members of the Department of Agriculture, in its various bureaus and branches, have been referred to as all the way from highwaymen to dishwashers, housemakers, and the like, not one single Department head or underling has asked me to come before this House and make this request for $800,000 additional for the extermination and control of the pink bollworm.

The pink bollworm is strategically located in a section of my State and is found in very small numbers in my own district, so why do I ask this increase? The increase I am asking is for the purpose of attempting to defend the American cotton industry and all the allied lines of human endeavor which would be affected were the cotton industry to be destroyed or seriously impaired, as unquestionably it will be if the pink bollworm makes a successful invasion of the Cotton Belt.

Members of the Committee on Appropriations gave me a very attentive hearing, and at the conclusion of my best effort to lay the matter before them in an intelligible way I was confronted with this question:

Mr. KLEBERG, the Department says that they have concluded the clean-up work in the Rio Grande. Why do you need more money if they have concluded the work?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. It so happens that a question such as the one I have just referred to indicates a misunderstanding or considerable misinformation concerning the facts and need for the additional money I am asking. It is equally true, Mr. Chairman, that every Member of this House who has served for at least one full term knows that cotton is planted every year, save only wild cotton, which by comparison to the domestic variety is of little or no value.

Since 1917 this question has been presented to the Congress, and members of the Committee on Appropriations who have been on that committee since that time know that much has been learned concerning the factual and practical advance looking toward eradication and control of the pink bollworm.

The clean-up process is one of the main avenues of defense against a successful invasion by this, the most destructive of all the cotton pests. The clean-up program must go forward each and every year at the conclusion of the cotton-harvesting season. Therefore the question, Why more money if the Department says they have completed their work? is one which of itself shows a lack of knowledge concerning the practical proposition or much misinformation.

If the pink bollworm gets into the cotton-growing area of the United States those engaged in various lines of industry different from cotton production will feel an immediate and direct impact from the failure of the American cotton producer to produce cotton, due to the additional cost and the destruction of the grade and staple of the cotton he sells, because the United States will go out of the cotton business. Forty out of every one hundred men gainfully employed in industry in 1935 were employed by industries that utilize cotton as an essential and vitally necessary part of their finished manufactured product.

An analysis of what a noncotton zone would mean is the best indication of what the Government of the United States might be called upon to do in this country if it were to bear the financial needs of meeting such a situation in almost any section of the South. This may be developed by an examination into possible definite and conclusive evidence that school teachers, doctors, gas-filling-station men, drygoodsmen, dentists, in short, almost every line of human endeavor would immediately be affected were no cotton produced in any section of the South, with the consequent loss of that essential—money—which comes each season when the crop is harvested. So I hope no Member will think that my request here for additional funds to the extent of $800,000 is a request purely for what might be termed "farm relief."

I hope my distinguished and able colleague from Virginia, whom I much respect and whom I consider as a beloved friend, will grant me at least the point that this appropriation that I am requesting be increased, is one affecting a fundamental and basic purpose. There are numbers of appropriations in this bill for good and valid purposes, but I say to you, with all of the seriousness at my disposal and mustering every bit of emphasis which I can put behind the statement, that there is no dollar spent in the bill under consideration that is of more essential or vital importance if, and God forbid it should ever come—the pink boll weevil reached the heart of the cotton-producing area of these United States. The results of that invasion are far more imminent than any invasion which we might fear by a foreign foe.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I am very much interested in the statement of the gentleman and I am wondering if he will discuss the question of what cooperation has been received from the Mexican Government. I understand that this infestation occurs over and over again in the Mexican territory whence these bugs come, and unless that is got rid of, we really cannot do any effective work in the United States.

Mr. KLEBERG. I am delighted that my friend has asked me that question, because I want to bring that out in the concluding part of my remarks.

First of all, the problem involved is an international problem. It is a problem which has nothing on earth to do with any one particular State. The invasion I referred to earlier in my remarks, comes from Mexico and it comes, in the main, through the air lanes and, God willing, up to date, we have had no prevailing winds, such as occasionally occur, from a suitable direction to take this insect into the interior producing areas of the United States.

Of course, the Congress is aware, inasmuch as it passed a bill last year for this purpose, that conferences are going forward between representatives of the Mexican Government and of the Government of the United States, looking toward ways and means of finally eradicating the pink bollworm in Mexico. Of course, until the pink bollworm is eradicated in Mexico we cannot expect to find ourselves able to cease our fight to prevent his making a successful invasion into the United States of America. Of course, the control provided, in effect, by the Department of Agriculture and the experts of the Bureau of Entomology provide, first of all, for a retardation of the planting season, so there will be no ripe cotton and no green bolls or ripe cotton fruit, squares, or any other form of the fruit in existence at the time the boll weevil emerges into the moth stage. At the time the bollworm emerges into the moth stage he lives for a comparatively short period of time—a few days—and failing to find fruit upon which to subsist, he dies in that period and consequently is not able to procreate himself.

The propagation period in the life of that bug occurs at the time he emerges from the moth stage. So by the retardation of planting, the moth that comes out early in May, finding no green cotton bolls, no squares, and no flower, finds no host and passes the stage during which he can procreate himself in an aimless search for food. I shall not attempt to go into the scientific details while occupying the floor, but will ask unanimous consent at the conclusion of my remarks to insert in the RECORD a complete history of the program and the definite reasons why, from my own personal study, this additional fund is asked for by me.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. I have been charged by the Texas delegation, as chairman of a committee created for the purpose of trying to prevent this invasion, with this duty. The statement I am making here today is upon my own responsibility, not at any urgent requirement of any department, but is at the instance of repeated requests from great numbers of cotton growers—from many of the cotton-producing States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in summation, may I present to you the appropriations and expenditures for pink bollworm control work for the fiscal years 1913 through 1940?

¹ In 1928 $5,000,000 was appropriated for noncotton zones of which none was spent.

² In 1929 $19,805 was appropriated for research work of which $19,370 was spent.

³ In 1931 there was appropriated $675,000 in Arizona for noncotton zones of which $635,982 was spent.

I do this in order that you may know that, despite the considerable sums which have been appropriated, that not all have been expended, but, notwithstanding this, the most dangerous pest affecting cotton has not gained a real foothold in the cotton-producing area of the United States.

Dr. R. E. McDonald, in charge of the pink bollworm control work in the affected areas in Texas, speaking before a great meeting called by Dr. Strong, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, in San Antonio, Tex., on Friday, December 15, 1939, made the following statement in the matter of the status of the pink bollworm in cotton in the United States:

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen, the pink bollworm came to this continent about 25 years ago and to the United States some 20 years ago. At that time not as much was known about it as now, but even then it caused great anxiety among those persons who were informed about the true character of this plague. Now the information about the severity of this insect is much more widely disseminated. Practically everybody engaged in the cotton business, as a grower, handler, or otherwise, is now fully informed about the possible consequences of a spread of the pink bollworm over the Cotton Belt of the United States. During the past few years the cotton industry in the United States has met with a number of handicaps, among these being the boll weevil and other insect pests, soil depletion, and foreign competition. It now seems to be the consensus of opinion among those people best able to judge of such matters that the pink bollworm would probably be an additional burden of such nature that cotton production in many areas in the United States would ultimately be abandoned.

The scientists of the world have been studying the pink bollworm for many years and up to this time nobody has found a method whereby a farmer can apply any system of culture, insecticide, or what not, with any hope of substantially reducing his damage. The insect, as a flying moth, can travel from field to field with such ease that it does not seem to be worth the effort of an individual farmer to take the pains to destroy the insects on his own farm, if all the neighbors do not do likewise. Furthermore, during the growing season when the insects are in the field, there is no known means of killing them without complete destruction of the crop.

There have been developed some methods of repression that can be practiced with beneficial results when carried out over a wide area without exceptions, although they are somewhat costly. These consist in the sterilization of all seed, the burning of all trash coming from the gins, the cleaning of points of concentration, the cleaning of fields, and regulating the planting dates. Where such measures are practiced diligently by everybody losses may be reduced, at least in some localities. It should be understood, however, that the application of such measures can only be carried out by laws rigidly enforced. Measures to control the pink bollworm to the point to bring reduction in damage must be complete in a given area, and that cannot be done if it is left to voluntary compliance, because all the people never agree about anything. Besides, there are always providential hindrances to handicap a program of this kind. It must be admitted that such a law is objectionable, in that it is an imposition upon personal liberty, and it would probably be resorted to by the States and areas only after all other measures have proved entirely useless.

Such measures applied in other countries have not eliminated the damage entirely, and they cannot be applied without considerable cost, and that in itself will increase the cost of production. Therefore it can be predicted with certainty that if the pink bollworm spreads over the Cotton Belt the per acre cost of producing cotton will be increased, the acre yield will be decreased, the quality of the lint lowered, and whether we will stay in the cotton business can be answered only after we learn definitely how much the cost of production will be increased, how much the yield will be decreased, and how much the quality will be lowered.

So it is that the pink bollworm is greatly feared in the United States, as well as in our neighboring Republic to the south, Mexico. It is on account of the desire of the people to avoid these prospective losses that we are discussing this problem. During the last 20 years of this fight against the pink bollworm we have followed the belief that prevention is better than cure, and wherever isolated infestations have sprung up we have applied repressive measures, sometimes radical. By careful attention to details, these isolated infestations in the years past have been eradicated. By that means we have at least gained a stay of execution for the cotton industry; although in the past there have been times when the situation looked rather hopeless and perhaps a pessimistic attitude would have been defensible.

We now have a situation which, without any fear of contradiction, can be said to be the worst we have ever faced. The pink bollworm was first discovered in the lower Rio Grande Valley in August 1936. That year there were only a few, but in 1937 there were a few more—still not alarming. Repressive measures were applied which included the cleaning of fields in the fall by the farmers themselves. A fair job for a cooperative program was done, but it was not by any means perfect. In 1938 there were more worms in that area, considerably more. In that year they spread up to the coastal-bend area; possibly the moths were blown there. In that year the farmers, including those in the coastal bend, again cooperated in a splendid way on both sides of the river, cleaning their fields as best they could, and it had every appearance of being a good job.

In the spring of 1939, to be exact, on the 10th of May, pink bollworms were found near the river, a little west of Brownsville, in the first cotton blooms. They increased rapidly in those fields near to the river, beginning on the bolls as soon as they began to mature, increasing up to as much as 40 percent infestation by the end of the season.

Early in the fall, through the examination of trash from the gins, these insects were found in other parts of Cameron County and in Hidalgo, Willacy, and Starr. Then from August 7 to 15 they were discovered in Brooks, Kleberg, and Jim Wells Counties. On August 16 and 17 others were found in Brooks, Kleberg, and Jim Wells; also in Nueces, Jim Hogg, and Duval. Still later on they were found in Zapata, Webb, Maverick, and La Salle Counties and in the Don Martin area of Mexico. This gives every appearance of spread during the growing season of 1939 from this initial infestation along the river to all these other places, and probably through the medium of winds. Furthermore, it appears that the infestation which existed in some four of these counties in the 1938 crop was probably eradicated by the clean-up of that year and came back in the fall of 1939 from the same source as before.

In the fall of 1939 there was available the sum of $460,000 that had been appropriated by Congress to help these farmers destroy the pink bollworms in their fields after harvest. A better job was done than in 1938, not only on the American side but on the Mexican side, where the farmers did the work without any help from the Government. The results of this job in the fall of 1939 as to its control of the pink bollworm cannot be accurately determined until the crop season of 1940.

We can very well see that the control measures in this locality up to now have succeeded in preventing a more rapid increase and consequently a more widespread infestation. While the pink-bollworm population has been increasing in spite of these efforts, it has not increased anything like it would have had nothing been done. Therefore, had no measures been applied, undoubtedly the whole State of Texas and perhaps other States would now have become infested. Up to this moment the success of these suppressive measures is that we have gained a little more time—perhaps not much—in which to work out and execute better plans.

Therefore, we should consider most carefully any additional measures which might be taken to eradicate or further repress this insect. It has been said that we cannot accurately judge the results of the 1939 efforts until we can examine the 1940 crop. Shall we wait until then to make plans? Wherever we can find a fruiting stalk of cotton in the lower Rio Grande Valley, either in Mexico or in the United States, we can find living pink bollworms today. We have been finding the insect right along on okra. Therefore, we know positively that it has not been completely eradicated by this year's efforts.

There can be no doubt, whatsoever, but that by the application of these measures in the fall of 1939 the population has been reduced, possibly as much as 99 percent, possibly not so much. But some are still there, and there will be an infestation in that area in the crop of 1940 unless we can apply additional measures; whether that infestation will be less than, as much as, or more than the 1939 infestation nobody knows. As was pointed out, it appears that the infestation in the 1939 crop in some of the upper localities was eradicated by the suppressive measures of that year. If that is the case, we can hope for the same from the suppressive measures for 1939 for these same localities; but it does not appear that we should stop without making an effort at further suppression looking to complete eradication at the danger spot along the river, because it seems that if we wait to determine the results of what has already been done, then we will not have any time to prepare plans, or we may have missed an opportunity to deal the insect a finishing blow.

A conference was held in the city of Washington a short time ago and this question was thoroughly discussed. After the most careful consideration, it was concluded that the best thing to do now to insure eradication in this locality would be to suppress the growing of cotton entirely for the crop season of 1940 in all the lower Rio Grande Valley, on both sides of the river, and including the area adjacent to the river on both sides as far up as Eagle Pass, and intensify the efforts farther away from the river in areas which had incipient infestations this year.

To carry into effect such plan would mean that the State of Texas and the Republic of Mexico would have to exercise the necessary authority to prohibit the growing of cotton in these areas, and that funds would have to be provided to compensate the citizens for the losses that they might sustain. It has now been determined that such noncotton zones cannot be carried out, at least, at this time.

Another plan was discussed in Washington as a possible substitute for the foregoing, consisting of making a barrier zone between the infested area of the lower Rio Grande Valley of Mexico and the main Cotton Belt. This barrier zone would include nearly all, or all, of the lower Rio Grande Valley counties, then all the counties up to the Nueces River, in which the growing of cotton would be prohibited for such time as might be necessary for the completion of arrangements to effect complete eradication from this general locality.

This would be an attempt to create a noncotton zone of a width sufficient to prevent moths from flying over. Even with a cotton-free zone of this width we might expect some infestations from year to year beyond such a barrier zone. Therefore, there would have to be arrangements made to apply repressive measures to these areas that might become infested by moths spreading across the barrier zone. It was pointed out that if it were necessary to apply repressive measures to incipient infestations which may occur outside of such barrier zone then it might be as well not to have such barrier zone, free of cotton, at all, but let cotton be grown in the so-called barrier zone and apply more rigid control measures therein.

This suggestion has other objectionable features in addition to its weakness of possibly not being wide enough to prevent spread across. One of the first questions with reference to a recommendation of this sort is, "How long will it be necessary to maintain a noncotton zone?" That question cannot well be answered. Hence, the effect of it will be putting a very large area out of the cotton business for an indefinite period. Considering these weaknesses of this plan and the large costs for compensation to growers and others in such a large area, it is altogether improbable that financial arrangements could be made to carry forward such scheme. Certainly there is not time enough to arrange these finances prior to planting time. Therefore, both of these plans, one for a noncotton zone on both sides of the river and the other for a barrier zone on the Texas side, for the moment might as well be left out of consideration as impossible of accomplishment before planting time of 1940.

It was further discussed and agreed that in the event measures cannot be undertaken looking to complete eradication in this locality at this time, as heretofore discussed, then we should continue as heretofore, intensifying and improving in every particular possible. Some improvements can probably be made in the fall destruction of stalks, by improved methods of procedure. In addition to that, we considered a retarded planting date in the spring. This is of great importance and will be more fully discussed further on.

There is no chance to destroy the pink bollworm in green cotton without destroying the cotton, but we can kill these worms in large numbers in the cottonseed, after ginning, and by burning the gin trash which contains many worms, and by destroying the crop remnants left in the fields after picking. This cuts down the population that might live through the winter in a resting stage, to deplete upon the following crop. In addition, in this southern locality cotton is picked before cold weather sets in, and at the time cotton picking is finished many of the pink bollworms are not ready to go into the resting stage for the purpose of passing over the winter.

Therefore, in that locality we have a favorable period in this insect's existence in which to attack it, which is to cut off its food as quickly as we can after the picking season by killing the green cotton plants. This has been done; but due to the difficulty of quickly killing cotton plants in this subtropical locality, it is not so easy as it might seem and cannot be accomplished as quickly as in a locality where cotton does not sprout so readily.

If the stalks are cut off, even a distance underground, in the short space of 2 weeks sprouts are again squaring. One plowing will not kill all the cotton. Often it takes four plowings and the use of hand tools to get all the cotton. Over and above the necessary farm operations, it costs about $1.75 per acre to kill the cotton plants after picking. There are about 150,000 acres in Mexico and about 250,000 acres in the United States—in the valley proper. In the rest of the infested area in south Texas there are about 300,000 acres of cotton. Here the cost, over and above the necessary farm operations, will be about $1.50 per acre to kill the cotton plants. These costs for killing the plants include hand labor used in grubbing out stub plants which come up from the roots.

But there is another place in this insect's existence where we can attack it. In the spring the pink bollworms which have passed through the winter in a sleeping condition emerge as moths. This little moth, which is very small and flies around at night, only lives a few days and the function of this state of the insect is to lay eggs on the green cotton, or it may use okra for that purpose. If it can find no green cotton fruit—squares, blooms, or bolls—then it wastes its few days of life flying about hunting for these things and will die without propagating itself. Therefore, if we plant cotton early, that cotton is found to have fruit on it when the pink bollworm comes out from its winter quarters—thus, we have an ideal condition for its propagation—thus, we start the year by giving aid to all emerging moths and they reproduce themselves every 25 or 30 days from then on.

In this lower Rio Grande Valley cotton is planted along from January to May, according as it rains. Therefore, the spring-emerging moths have no difficulty in finding plenty of cotton fruit on which to place eggs. A substantial delay in the planting date would result in a great increase in the suicidal emergence, and this delay should be sufficient so that there will be no cotton fruit of any character before the latter part of May, which would be beyond the period of maximum emergence of the moths. Such plan, on account of the irregularity of the rainfall, is not as easy of accomplishment in this locality as in some others.

However, such a plan can certainly be put into practice in the area near the river on both sides for the year 1940, where infestation in the year of 1939 was most heavy and where the lands are more conducive to rank-growing cotton and thus more susceptible to pink bollworm attack. In this area trap plots can be planted so as to induce the moths not to fly out of that spot where conditions of humidity naturally cause them to congregate early in the season, and the fruit from these trap plots picked off daily and burned.

It can be stated for this plan that it has proven its worth, beyond a doubt, in some other areas. In the Salt River Valley of Arizona there was a heavy infestation in the 1929 crop. That part of the Salt River Valley then found to be substantially infested was placed under a noncotton zone for the year 1930, but in that year light infestations were found in various other places in the valley. These were not placed under a noncotton zone, but the fields were cleaned during the winter of 1930-31, and planting of cotton was delayed in the spring of 1930. That fall there were still a few infestations, but reduced in number and intensity. The same plan of delayed planting for cotton in the spring of 1932 in the Salt River Valley of Arizona was repeated, with the result of complete eradication.

In the Big Bend of Texas, where the insect was estimated by the farmers to have taken at least 50 percent of the crop in 1938, an early fall clean-up of fields and a late planting date in 1939 resulted in a great reduction. It is possible that this plan of fall destruction and delayed planting, if kept up awhile, would bring about eradication were it not for the fact that the Big Bend is subject to reinfestation. Certainly, if we can prevent a build-up of the infestation each year, the damage to the cotton crop of the Big Bend will continue to be negligible, as was the case this year.

Conditions for reinfestation in the lower Rio Grande Valley are not nearly so favorable as for the Big Bend. This statement is based on the fact that infestation spread from the Laguna of Mexico to the Big Bend of Texas many years ago. As a matter of fact, the pink bollworm was widely distributed over the Big Bend in 1918; whereas, it was not until 1936 that pink bollworm infestation was found to be present in the lower Rio Grande Valley.

Consequently, if we can reduce the infestation year by year in the lower Rio Grande Valley, soon the infestation will reach the vanishing point. We know from our experience in the Big Bend and in Arizona that a combination of fall clean-up and delayed planting in the spring, coupled with the maintenance of a host-free period subsequent to fall clean-up and prior to the delayed planting, offers the best hope for control, second only to a one- or two-year host-free period over the infested areas. Unfavorable weather conditions often prevent early completion of the fall clean-up, resulting in many pink bollworms going into hibernation.

It seems clear that in order to prevent the dissemination of the pink bollworm over the Cotton Belt, with its disastrous results, the infestation in south Texas must be eradicated or controlled.

Consideration might well be given to a continuation and improvement of the measures heretofore in effect; namely, the sterilization of seed, burning of cotton waste, and the cleaning of fields as soon as possible after picking, and to retarding the planting date in the spring.

Since the infestation is centered near the river a special zone might be set up embracing this heavily infested area on both sides of the river, and more rigid measures of control applied therein which would include as much delay in planting as possible. Also, careful attention should be given to okra to the end that this plant does not serve to breed the pink bollworm during the period when there is no cotton in fruit. The above measures have been discussed with the officials of the Republic of Mexico and they are in full agreement and will cooperate with us to the best of their ability in carrying them out.

LXXXVI—62

I want to point to these maps and merely indicate what is meant here. This is a map of Florida where the pink bollworm has existed on wild cotton. We commenced to destroy that wild cotton in 1932. This line emphasizes an area that was covered at that time with wild cotton found as far north, almost, as Tampa. Now no pink bollworms are found except a very few in the very southern part of Florida, so that work is pretty well in hand.

This map is a representation of the cotton industry. Each dot represents 1,000 bales of cotton and shows where and how much cotton is produced in the United States. These areas enclosed by yellow pins indicate areas where pink bollworm in past years has been introduced and has been completely eradicated.

I mentioned that pink bollworm had been eradicated from the Salt River Valley. That is true, but recently the pink bollworm has been reintroduced so we cannot surround it by yellow pins as we did a year or two ago.

These lines cover an area in the United States where infestation is now known to exist—Arizona to New Mexico and western Texas and southern Texas. This is the Laguna and Don Martin area of Mexico. As I pointed out, our greatest fear now is from this area. This area remains pretty much today as it has for several years.

This map is a map of southern Texas and undertakes to show you something about how the pink bollworm spread from this focus of infestation from Brownsville in the year 1939 to these other spots. You will notice it takes a northwesterly direction. Its direction spreads up around near Alice. Then we pass through areas where no cotton was produced in 1939.

I have noticed the weather records that year. The winds have been more northwesterly. Sometimes they are more northerly and perchance may be more easterly, and then if the condition is down there at that time, say, as it was in 1939, in the fall, it will just be too bad, because it will get up here and strike continuous cotton fields from then on to all the northern limit of the Cotton Belt. I thank you. [Applause.]

Dr. McDonald is by practical experience as well as scientific training together with recently applied practice probably the best acquainted and informed man concerning pink bollworm and methods looking toward its control in this or any other country. I hope my distinguished friend the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] will find an answer to his interrogation concerning the situation in Mexico in what Dr. McDonald has to say.

The simple facts are once a knowledge of the dangers contained in the possibilities of the pink bollworm gaining a foothold in the Cotton Belt of the United States that Members of Congress who failed to expend the paltry sum I request in defense of cotton production in the United States would find themselves convicted in their own minds of the serious offense of being utterly recreant to the major trust reposed in them looking toward not only the general but the continued welfare of our country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be reserved to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

The pink bollworm is one of the greatest dangers that has ever threatened the cotton-growing sections of the United States. Do not get it confused with the boll weevil. The boll weevil flies long distances. We have learned to combat it, but we have never learned to successfully combat the pink bollworm, which spreads gradually and absolutely exterminates the cotton crop and prevents reproduction on the lands it infests.

Remember that America's balance of foreign trade depends upon her cotton. Wherever the pink bollworm moves and destroys the production of cotton something else must be substituted. You Members from other sections, who are already complaining at the competition, remember that if the pink bollworm should destroy the cotton crop and prevent its growth in certain areas in the Southern States those farmers will immediately begin to compete with you in the production of wheat, hay, corn, dairy products, cattle, hogs, and so forth.

Mr. HOFFMAN. They are already doing it.

Mr. RANKIN. They are already doing it, but they will do more of it.

During the Sixty-seventh Congress we had a debate on this floor, and I remember a gentleman from West Virginia confused the pink bollworm with the boll weevil. I find a great many Members do that today. At that time the Department of Agriculture was shipping small bags of cottonseed throughout the South. I pointed out then that if they should happen to send one that had the germ of the pink bollworm in it, and the farmer plants it in the middle of his field, he might destroy his land as far as cotton production is concerned.

This is much more important than a great many other things we are doing, even in the very areas where these bollworms are threatening. So I sincerely trust that this amendment will be adopted, and that you will aid us to keep down the spread of this pest until such arrangement can be made with the Mexican Government, if possible, as will result in its extermination throughout that country. Frankly, I doubt if that is done. I think we are in a battle from now on to prevent this pink bollworm from destroying the cotton crop throughout the entire South. If you let it get started, it will spread like a forest fire. The farther it goes, the more dangerous it is, and the greater destruction it will bring.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I agree with what my distinguished colleague from Mississippi has said. This fall I had the opportunity to go into the great State of Alabama—into what is known as the black lands. One of my friends had moved from Missouri down to Alabama and had gone into the cattle business in that State. They drove me over a large section of that country formerly renowned as a cotton country, but now useless for that purpose because of the boll weevil. Now, they are going to Texas and buying cattle and going into the cattle business on a large scale because the boll weevil had driven the cotton farmers out of business. If this pink bollworm gets a foothold in America and does what experience has shown it can do, and will do, then the people of Wisconsin and Minnesota had better look out for a real rival in the dairy and stock business—not only these people but the people of the West will feel the effects of this competition in the years to come.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman from Missouri. He is entirely right. We can check this thing now. We can do it with a very small expenditure, compared with what we are expending on other things.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] has given this question a great deal of study. He lives down there where the danger is acute. We are not asking for an unreasonable appropriation but for a few hundred thousand dollars that will probably save the farmers of this country millions or hundreds of millions of dollars in the years to come. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I once knew a gentleman who was so ingenious and agile of mind that he proved to his own satisfaction that the Civil War was started because this country had never adopted the metric system. I think my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is equally agile in indicating all the danger that will result unless this amendment is adopted, but he entirely misses the point. So now let us disperse some of that by fact.

We appropriated $906,800 in 1940. When the Budget figures came to us this year it was $527,000 for pink-bollworm control. This is not eradication. This is not investigation. This is control. That is the language of the bill. Now, why did the Budget cut it from $906,800 to $527,000? Here is the language of the Budget:

The decrease is due to completion of the field clean-up for suppression of pink bollworm in the lower Rio Grande Valley.

That is the language of the Budget. Here is additional language, and I quote:

To intensify the clean-up in Texas and get the work done shortly after harvest, $460,000 was appropriated for the current fiscal year.

That was extra money in this year's bill.

This work has been completed. With the cooperation of the Texas State department of agriculture the fields in south Texas were cleaned as promptly as possible after harvest, and crop residues were destroyed.

I am not unmindful of the fact that this is a problem, but there are $527,000 in this bill for control of the pink bollworm, and the Budget, with the recommendation and endorsement of the President, said that in their judgment that was enough.

You are not going to eradicate the boll weevil with this money, because the Budget sends us this statement, and this comes from the Department:

It is not believed possible that the insect can be eradicated from the infested areas in sections adjacent to sources of infestation in Mexico by action taken by this country alone.

If these conversations are going on down in the State Department which are designed to secure a measure of cooperation from Mexico, we have not had that cooperation thus far; yet here our friend from Texas is asking $800,000 more for this purpose.

Must I remind you that this control has been going on for 10 years? I remind you that we have appropriated $4,200,000 for this purpose. When the Bureau of the Budget and the President say to us that the clean-up work for which the extra money was inserted in the bill for 1940 has been completed in Texas, it is the best judgment of the committee, the judgment of the Budget Bureau, and apparently the judgment of the Department of Agriculture—because it is their justification—that $526,800 is enough for this purpose. Consequently, there would be no virtue in writing another $800,000 into this bill for this purpose. Be not misled that we have cut it out or that we are insensitive to the aggravation of the pink bollworm. The work will go on. In addition, there are other appropriations in this bill for investigatory work.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. According to the gentleman's own statement, we are not getting favorable reaction from Mexico. This is all the more reason for guarding against infestation from across the border.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am going by the statement of the Department of Agriculture that the work for which this extra money was appropriated has been completed.

Mr. RANKIN. Those of us who live in that country, who come in contact with the pink bollworm, know the extent of its devastation. Besides, there are other areas which have been found to be infested—Louisiana, I think, and probably southern Alabama. It is going to take eternal vigilance to keep this thing from spreading in various areas and ultimately destroying the cotton-growing industry of America.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What has the gentleman to say of the statement of the Department of Agriculture that the clean-up job there has been completed? That is the answer.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; that is what they have done, but they have got to keep at it from now on. Unless they get this cooperation from the Government of Mexico, what they have done will be of no avail. The gentleman from Texas, like myself, is not willing to depend on what the Government of Mexico may do. We have got to continue this job ourselves.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would say to my friend from Mississippi that while I have the highest regard for his judgment on this matter, I would rather take the judgment of the bug specialists in the Department of Agriculture whose business it is to know about this item.

Mr. RANKIN. Do not listen to too many bugs.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired; all time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANKIN) there were—ayes 47, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Control investigations: For developing equipment or apparatus to aid in enforcing plant quarantines, eradication and control of plant pests, determining methods of disinfecting plants and plant products to eliminate injurious pests, determining the toxicity of insecticides, and related phases of insect-pest control, $72,518, of which not less than $10,000 shall be used for methyl-bromide investigations.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a motion which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOFFMAN moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with instructions that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall withdraw the motion as soon as I have spoken, but with a prima donna in charge over here on the minority side I have not been able to get any time before, so take this method.

I have no doubt but that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] knows more about this bug business than is bothering cotton growers than they do down in the Department of Agriculture. I know also that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has been treated fairly well on his T. V. A. by the House and some of us on the other side. I know, too, that we would be more willing to go along on this bug extermination business if the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Mississippi would help us a little once in a while, when we are trying to maintain the right of women and men to work without paying tribute. Perhaps that suggestion smacks of what they call logrolling and is said to be improper, but I do understand from private confidential sources that it is practiced at times.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. In just a moment. The gentleman from Mississippi lives over in the same building I live in, over here in the Methodist Building. He is a good Methodist and I am a Lutheran, but to get into that building he is walking through a picket line. I am not talking about bugs and worms; I am talking about the girls over in that building who want to work in the dining room where he eats—the girls who want to work without being required to pay for the exercise of that right.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will yield, I keep house.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Well, I saw the gentleman there last night with another Member of the House. Maybe the gentleman was not eating. I do not say the gentleman was drinking. If he was, it was tea or milk. [Laughter.] But he was sitting at a table with food before him and his friend.

Those girls want to work. The woman who is operating that dining room is having a hard time. She took over a losing business and made a success of it to the extent that, making but little more than expenses, she is able to meet the pay roll, and until the organizer came along the employees—some have been with her for years—were satisfied. But here comes Mr. Mink—Mr. Mink from downtown. Is he interested in the wages paid the girls or is he interested in the dues he can collect if he forces them into the union? The place is being picketed to force all the employees to join the union. What does Mr. Mink care about the financial condition of Mrs. Miller, who is trying to keep the business alive? If he ruins her, the jobs are gone. Will he or his union give those who work there other jobs equally good? Will he?

I understand that some of the girls working there joined his union, and that he wants the woman who is operating the place where the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] eats, at times, to fire all the rest of these girls who did not want to join the union. Mr. Mink may be a pretty good-sized fat fellow. He wants those girls working in there to pay his union for the privilege of earning a livelihood. That lady over there raised the pay of those girls in July and in January, as is her custom, and when she gave them a raise not long ago Miss Faris, of the Labor Board, told her—and this is a Labor Board ruling—that increasing the wage is an unfair labor practice because she did not consult Mr. Mink or the union first. The only object Mr. Mink can have in wanting to know about the proposed raise in pay would be so Mr. Mink would get the credit for the increase.

I hope my good Christian friend will join me in the attempt to protect these employees. He certainly is a good Christian. He has talked to me about things I should not have done. [Laughter and applause.] I hope that my good friend will see his way clear to devote a little of his time; take a little time off from his T. V. A. campaign, that is now a big, swollen, prosperous giant, and help out this poor woman and those poor girls over there who are trying to make a living; help them get out from under the clutches of Mr. Mink. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan says I have talked religion to him. I believe he might have said that I prayed for him, too. I hope it takes, for I am fond of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do, too.

Mr. RANKIN. I was sincere. The place he is talking about, the Methodist Building, where we happen to have apartments, has a dining room downstairs. I live in that building; we have an apartment, but sometimes we do go down to the dining room to eat. I did not know these strikers were after the gentleman from Michigan. I have not seen them, but I take his word for it that the C. I. O. or some union had attempted to organize the waitresses in that dining room. The few times I have been down there we have received excellent service. I do not know anything about the wage scale. That is not my business. Unfortunately, I have to work pretty late sometimes, and if there was a picket line there last night when I went home I did not see it. There was none when I left there this morning.

Mr. HOFFMAN. They do not serve breakfast over there.

Mr. RANKIN. We eat breakfast in our apartment. If the gentleman will come by sometime, I will give him a breakfast of Mississippi ham that was cured in a cooperative cold-storage plant that is operated with T. V. A. power. It will make him forget all about picket lines.

These matters between the laborers, their organizations, and the employers in the District of Columbia are not particularly the personal charges of the gentleman from Michigan or me. They made no particular appeal to me. I do not know whether they made any to the Labor Board or to the District authorities or not. So far as I am individually concerned, as I previously stated, we have received excellent service in the Methodist Building, and I trust that they will not stir up a strike there and put that lady out of business. She serves meals not only to the people who live in the building but also to those who reside in that area.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. When you invite the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] to eat some of that Mississippi ham, when he does so, perhaps you two can then iron out the differences.

Mr. RANKIN. I certainly will not give him any Milwaukee beer. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words to ask a question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], in charge of the bill, to satisfy my insatiable curiosity.

I call his attention to the language on page 56, line 23, and particularly to the appropriation of $72,518, "of which not less than $10,000 shall be used for methyl bromide investigations." How does the Committee on Appropriations get into that frame of mind? If $9,000 is sufficient, must they spend the remaining $1,000?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. This is the third year funds have been provided for this purpose. Commissioners of agriculture from States as far west as California personally called on the committee and asked that it be included.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Cannot the Department of Agriculture be trusted to expend from the $72,000 the amount that it regards sufficient?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The original amount was $10,000. Last year the Budget cut it down to $5,000. This year, in accordance with the showing made to the committee, we provided for the full $10,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Department of Agriculture, I assume, did not ask for this mandate, did it? This is a mandate on the Department to spend not less than $10,000.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is right. The Department of Agriculture approved of the investigations and the amount.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I may say, Mr. Chairman, the item has a distrustful appearance. Someone is distrusted by the committee. I abandon any further attempt.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Items are frequently earmarked in this manner.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, this morning I received a letter from the secretary of agriculture of Iowa, who is greatly disturbed about the chinch-bug situation. I desire to ask a question and I shall be glad if the chairman of the subcommittee will answer it.

I know the chairman of the subcommittee has a great infestation of chinch bugs in his district and State, and we have it in our State. We are greatly exercised. I have a letter here from the secretary of agriculture of Iowa about it.

There is an authorization in this bill for cereal- and forage-insect control. Heretofore the chinch bugs have been taken care of by a deficiency bill whenever an emergency arose. Is that the purpose now?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That has been the practice heretofore. There is a very excellent reason for it. As a rule, this bill does not reach final action until late in the spring, entirely too late to be effective against the chinch bugs. If the money is to be effective it must be applied in time. We now have a deficiency estimate just received under date of January 27 for $3,550,000, which will be taken up in the deficiency bill.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I thank the chairman of the committee. The chinch bug is a menace to crops throughout a great section of this country, and it ought to be taken care of.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Market news service: For collecting, publishing, and distributing, by telegraph, mail, or otherwise, timely information on the market supply and demand, commercial movement, location, disposition, quality, condition, and market prices of livestock, meats, fish, and animal products, dairy and poultry products, fruits and vegetables, peanuts and their products, grain, hay, feeds, cottonseed, and seeds, and other agricultural products, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the Government, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and person engaged in the production, transportation, marketing, and distribution of farm and food products, $1,100,000.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOREN: On page 13, line 14, after "products", strike out "$1,100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$600,000."

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, once more I rise to test the sentiment of the Members on their willingness to cut out useless appropriations and to save money for reappropriation to items that are essential to the farm program and actually helping the farmers of America.

I have carefully read these hearings, and I find that approximately $500,000 is spent in this program for leasing 7,500 miles of telegraph wire. I have examined the newspapers to discover just what information this organization has disseminated by that method. I have been a farmer and have lived on a farm most of my life. I have made frequent trips to the market. As a farmer I never once found any use for this information. I do not say this information is not of assistance to those who play the central markets, and I do not say this information is not of assistance to the big dealer in the basic commodities, but I do say that it is of no benefit to the real dirt farmer. Any farmer who wants this information about the market where he sells will get his daily paper and see what cattle or other products are selling for at the market he is going to sell on that day, and he will go to that market on the basis of the price that is quoted. There are 7,500 miles of telegraph wires leased and paid for by the Government for service that the newspapers would give daily anyway if there were any demand for it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. I may say that all the livestock forecasts on cattle, sheep, and hogs, prospective receipts, and the trend of the market are furnished to radio stations and to the newspapers by this service. The gentleman says the little fellow does not benefit. The farmer never packs up his five or six hogs in his pick-up truck and takes them in to the market until he gets the forecast the day before. Regardless of the size of the livestock operator, he depends on this service for his market information.

Mr. BOREN. Yes; daily, not hourly. This money is for hourly reports for the big man.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. If it were not for this service the little farmer could not get this information until it would be too late for him to use it.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. BOREN. Both the gentlemen are incorrect, in that they take the position that this information would not be offered if it were not paid for by the Federal Government. Any man who uses this information is a big enough buyer and seller to pay for his own telegraph service. I want to see some money saved here and paid down for the use of the little farmer. Let us see it go right down to the grass roots. I have seen thousands and thousands and thousands of dollars voted for the control of sweetpotato weevils, yet I have grown potatoes, and I have never seen or heard of one. Other thousands of dollars are appropriated for various causes which the average farmer of America never heard of and does not know are in existence. And the little farmer never caught a Government agent trying to help him control his crop pests.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BOREN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman talks about the big users.

Mr. BOREN. That is right.

Mr. RANKIN. They could have a private wire, that is true, but the small farmer about whom the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] spoke a moment ago would not get this information if the Government did not offer its services. The big dealers could get it, and then they could have a sweet monopoly.

Mr. BOREN. If there is a farmer in the United States Congress today who ever made use of this information—and I challenge any of you to go out here to the newspaper racks and check it—if there is one here today who ever made use of this information who does not sell in large quantities, I would be pleased to have him stand up and make it known.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that there are hundreds of small farmers, thousands of them, literally thousands of small farmers, who use it, but they do not all come to Congress. We are supposed to legislate for them. They use this service and get the benefit of this information. Men have come here clamoring for abolishing this information. If they did, they would turn the wires over to a few private concerns and they would raise the prices. This service trickles down to and reaches the little fellow who has only a few hogs or a few head of cattle to sell. He is the one it reaches. Of course, he is not here to answer the gentleman's challenge, but he gets the benefit of this service.

Mr. BOREN. I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi that he is absolutely wrong if there is any information on the market for which there is a demand, agents of the press such as these sitting above my head will see that this information is put in the daily press. I believe every penny of this money is spent solely for the benefit of the fellows who can pay for it themselves. Another case where the big boy gets the gravy and the little boy is forgotten. Let us do something for the little fellow. This money given to the telegraph companies to help the farmers? Why do we not put the money in the empty pocket of the small farmer? By the eternal, I am tired of voting great gifts to the bureaucrats under the guise of helping dirt farmers. This is an atrocious outrage in which the farmer is made the victim of a vicious farce.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON of Missouri) there were—ayes 68, noes 67.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered and the Chair appointed as tellers, Mr. BOREN and Mr. CANNON of Missouri.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 98, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

United States Warehouse Act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States Warehouse Act, $450,000.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REES of Kansas: On page 65, line 8, strike out $450,000 and insert $400,000.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I realize that an item of $50,000 is a comparatively small amount, but let me direct your attention to the extremely small amount of evidence that appears in the record on behalf of this increase of $50,000.

We have been spending around $400,000 just for warehouse inspection. I realize just as well as you do that careful warehouse inspection is necessary, but do you know that warehouse inspection is carried on in practically every State of the Union where it is necessary? In our own State of Kansas we have had a warehouse law that has been in effect for more than 20 years. We have out there about 400 licensed warehouses, 360 of the 400 being under State license and 40 under Federal license. Neither the owner of the grain nor anyone else interested has lost a dollar under the Kansas warehouse law.

We have in our own State-inspected warehouses practically 60 percent of the grain in the State. We are right there with our own organization on the ground and we can give better and more efficient service under State warehouse inspection at less expense.

I call your attention to the fact that a representative, not only of our own organization, but a representative of a group of those interested in this very proposition, appeared before the committees. The Departments of Agriculture of California, Iowa, Idaho, Oklahoma, and other places, telling this committee through their letters that an increase in this appropriation is unfounded and unnecessary.

Oh, I know they will call your attention to the necessity of inspection of certain wool growers' warehouses, but you will find upon careful investigation, if you want to take the time to make such an investigation, that even the $400,000 is unwarranted and unnecessary. It is just one more case where the Federal Government is going out and not only duplicating but taking charge of a service that is adequately rendered by the State.

I do hope you will see fit to support my amendment and return this figure at least to $400,000, and I am sure you will find that is plenty and adequate in every respect.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Of course, in a great many warehouses cotton is stored on which the Government has a loan, and, as a matter of fact, there is no comparison between the care that must be given to a cotton warehouse and a grain warehouse, because cotton is almost as explosive as gunpowder. Extreme care is required to protect such warehouses from fire. In many States there is no State protection, and for that reason it is necessary for the Government to exercise this care.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I appreciate what the gentleman says, but if he will examine the record he will find there is not more cotton in the warehouses now than there was 2 years ago. So we do not require any more money for the inspection of cotton warehouses.

The gentleman will also appreciate the fact that his own State does not have a satisfactory warehouse law. This ought to be provided. It does not have an adequate law, and that is true of some other States where cotton is raised, and such a law ought to be enacted; but what I am saying to you now is that the amount of $400,000 is adequate for this work. We inspect all of the wheat in Kansas for $40,000, and we collect it back in fees, so the State does not lose a thing in connection with it; but even at that we do not charge any more than the Federal Government is charging for its service. So I say to you that this additional $50,000 is just like a lot of other things we do on the floor of the House. We start out with a certain appropriation, and then we continue to increase it, and never once stop to think about cutting such appropriations down. If you will examine this record, you will find very little evidence in support of this additional appropriation; in fact, you will not find anywhere that it states it is necessary, except for the statement of someone from the Department who sends down a written statement on the matter.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I find that several of my grain elevators have been denied Federal licenses due to the fact that the warehouse fund has been exhausted. Without these licenses how can the farmer avail himself of the loan features provided in our agricultural program?

Mr. REES of Kansas. About the only thing I could do, if I had the time, would be to call your attention to a letter that comes from your own department of agriculture in Oklahoma, directed to the committee, with reference to that very proposition, wherein they say that it is unnecessary; and to the gentleman from California, I direct attention to a letter under date of January 4, 1940, signed by the Department of Agriculture, Division of Grain Inspection, with the signature of Mr. C. W. Wright, division chief of that State.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TARVER rose.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be concluded in 7 minutes, to be consumed by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I object to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes, 7 minutes of the time to be used by the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] is apparently proceeding on the idea that he is trying to cut this appropriation back to what it was for the present fiscal year, but in that he is mistaken. The appropriation for the present fiscal year is not $400,000, but $417,500. The regular appropriation was $400,000, but a deficiency appropriation of $17,500 was made, making the total for this year $417,500. So that the effect of the gentleman's amendment, instead of restoring the amount in the bill to the amount which was had in the present fiscal year, would reduce that amount by $17,500 below the amount for the present fiscal year.

This question did not arise in the subcommittee until after the conclusion of the hearing of departmental officials, when the chief grain inspector from the State of Kansas, with the chief warehouse examiner, came in and made these attacks upon the United States Warehousing Division. If the State of Kansas does not desire this service from the Federal Government, I should have no objection to the inclusion of a provision in the bill that none of the money herein provided shall be expended in the State of Kansas. But I know of no reason why, because of a difference of opinion that has arisen between the grain-inspection service in Kansas and the United States warehousing service, the rest of the country should be penalized, especially citizens of the country who are engaged in the production or warehousing of cotton or wool.

Let me say this: After I heard this rather startling evidence from the officials of the State of Kansas I took up this matter with the officials engaged in the carrying out of the provisions of the United States Warehousing Act. They told me this, and I have given this information to one of the gentlemen from Kansas who is interested in this matter, and if he is in a position to deny it of his own knowledge, I assume he will do it. They say this head man in Kansas has been trying for some time to get a job with the United States Warehousing Division and that he has been unsuccessful in his efforts. They attribute part of his animus in endeavoring to destroy and curtail the work of the division to the fact that he was unsuccessful in his efforts to secure employment under their jurisdiction.

Now, what is this State warehouse inspection work in Kansas? They talk about doing it for $40,000. Do you know how many employees they have? They have, as I am informed, this head man, chief inspector, and they have two warehouse inspectors under him. It is true they have 260 grain inspectors in the State, but they have only 2 warehouse inspectors under that head official, and that constitutes the department which is allegedly doing such efficient work.

I want you to read the justification in the hearings on page 713 and following pages. That shows the absolute necessity for the appropriation of the small additional amount carried in this bill for the adequate discharge of the responsibilities of this division. I hope that the House will not permit a service which has proven satisfactory to at least a major portion of the remainder of the country—certainly to the South insofar as cotton warehouse inspection activities are concerned—to be crippled because of this difference which appears to have arisen between the officials of the State of Kansas and the officials of the Federal Warehousing Division. If the gentleman from Kansas does not want any of this money spent in his State, if he wants the grain farmers of the State to be compelled to rely entirely upon the protection accorded them by the State organization, let him propose an amendment to this provision which will cut out any Federal service whatever for the grain farmers of the State of Kansas. I should reluctantly support it if the Representative from that State thought it was the proper thing to do.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Would that not prevent the grain farmers from getting Federal loans on their grain under the present law?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I will be glad to answer that question.

Mr. TARVER. The question was not addressed to the gentleman. The gentleman from Kansas, I will say, insists that the certificates issued by their State warehouse officials are equally satisfactory with the certificates issued upon the basis of inspection made by Federal inspectors, but that is not the insistence of our officials of the Federal Warehousing Division. They say the question asked by the gentleman from Mississippi should be answered in the affirmative—at least in part—and that a great deal of trouble would accrue to the wheat farmers of Kansas in the event they are deprived of the benefit of Federal licensing and inspection of grain warehouses. Of course, no warehouseman is obliged to apply for Federal license.

But, however that may be, if these gentlemen from Kansas want to get rid of the Federal service, let them limit their efforts to that service insofar as it affects the grain farmers of Kansas, and not try to deprive the cotton farmers, the wool farmers, and the grain farmers of other sections of the United States of a service which appears to them to be entirely satisfactory.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCORMACK). The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to my colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] said it only came at the end of the hearings. Nobody can be heard in the hearings proper until the Bureau and departments are through, but I gave notice when they first came before us that the Kansas grain inspector and warehousemen wanted to be heard, and they were assured they would be heard.

The head of the Kansas warehousing is national chairman of that group. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] entirely overlooks that fact. Mr. Bateman inserted in the hearings statements from various and numerous State warehouse heads substantiating his view. He is the national president. The gentleman from Georgia saw fit to get a transcription of the testimony of the Kansas men before the committee to the Department of Agriculture, contrary to ethics, and had them make a complete reply to the Kansas men's testimony, and tried to have it inserted in the hearings; and in his remarks today made a personal attack on Mr. Bateman on information received entirely outside the hearings.

I deleted the matter because it was within my purview entirely where there was not any question about it. I told the Department—

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? In view of the fact that he has made a statement that does not comport with the facts, will not the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. The gentleman from Georgia has had his 5 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. But the gentleman is making a statement that is untrue.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. It is not untrue.

Mr. TARVER. It is untrue.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. It is absolutely true.

Mr. TARVER. It is absolutely false.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Now, you sit down.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCORMACK). The gentleman from Kansas will suspend.

The gentleman declines to yield.

The gentleman from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I notified the Department men before the hearings were closed, told them they could come in at the end of the testimony by these Kansas men and testify themselves, but they did not. There is not any outside testimony in the hearings against the testimony of the Kansas men, not at all.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. No, I do not yield.

They tried, however, to slip into the hearings a complete answer, a detailed answer to the testimony of the Kansas men. It was only by accident that I discovered it and deleted it. There was not an argument or any evidence before the committee that answered the Kansas men or the testimony of the president of the national association. Kansas certificates are accepted in full by the Federal Government.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Just briefly; yes, I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. If Kansas certificates are accepted at full value what is the gentleman howling about?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. What do I want two inspections for at increased expense when the cost is high enough now? Answer that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. There are many States that do not have a State warehouse system.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. They ought to have.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And if loans are to be made on these various commodities by the Federal Government this service must be continued.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. It is only an effort on the part of several individuals to make Federal inspection compulsory in order to increase bureaucracy; that is all. There is no need for the double inspection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The gentleman will understand that there is still $400,000 left in the bill to take care of Federal inspections.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. The gentleman is correct. If we did what some of us would like to, we would strike it all out; but in order to be fair, we thought the thing should be continued on that basis for further study.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me now, in view of the fact that he has yielded to other gentlemen since he declined to yield to me?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I will yield to the gentleman for a very brief question, not for a speech.

Mr. TARVER. I do not want to make a speech. The gentleman's statement is the first information I have had that the division had submitted any statement to the committee or that the gentleman from Kansas had assumed authority to delete it, which he should not have done.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Yes. I saw that there was something being put in there purporting to be in direct answer. There was only one man who showed any interest in the Bureau's side, only one man; yet they had a complete typewritten transcription of everything that was purported to have been said, and it attempted to answer minutely the testimony of these men. They brought it up here and put it into the hearings, but I discovered it. Nobody else on the subcommittee showed any interest in the Federal side of it but the gentleman from Georgia. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD] for 2 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, last year, prior to the special session, we had a warehouse problem before the House. At the present time $450,000 is being appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the thought we had in mind at that time. We all know that the warehouses not bonded are not included in this particular category. In my judgment, the present appropriation is adequate and should be passed, because the experts who know what they are talking about have approved it. I do not know whether or not they know all the facts, but I assume they do. It is my judgment the appropriation set up in this bill ought to be accepted and that no amendment seeking to reduce it should be agreed to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] for 3 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether the real issue involved here has been stated as yet. There is involved here a controversy between State and Federal warehousing. The situation can best be explained by an example. All through the Western States—Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska, and the rest of them—are small elevators and warehouses. If they expect to issue warehouse receipts they must be licensed under the State law. To procure such license they must give a bond, that bond costing approximately $50. If they want to secure a Federal license they must also give a bond. So you have a total expenditure that falls upon many of these small warehouses and elevators. That is one issue involved.

The people who are the proponents of this amendment object to a further extension of warehousing and believe there ought to be a line of demarcation between Federal and State activities. The thing is more important than it seems, for the reason that you have the Commodity Credit Corporation, you have the Crop Insurance Act on the books, millions of bushels of whose grain is to be stored, and if the Federal warehousing goes further and discriminates between State and Federal elevators, between State licensed and federally licensed elevators, there is a great power for discrimination.

My notion about the solution is not in this amendment particularly, although I do not object to it. I think we ought to make this service stand on its own bottom by collecting a fee so that the $400,000 plus involved here is raised in the form of fees paid to the Federal Government in order that this service might become a self-liquidating function. They had $400,000 last year. An increase was provided for 1940, and the amendment proposes to cut it back to the figure for 1940. I have no objection.

This involves more than Kansas. It involves the rest of the Western States in which grain is raised. The issue is one of possible discrimination and the burden on small country elevators and warehouses throughout the Western States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCORMACK). All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAMBERTSON), there were—yeas 57, nays 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Soil and moisture conservation and land-use operations, demonstrations, and information: For carrying out preventive measures to conserve soil and moisture, including such special measures as may be necessary to prevent floods and the siltation of reservoirs, and including the improvement of farm irrigation and land drainage, the establishment and operation of erosion nurseries, the making of conservation plans and surveys, and the dissemination of information, $17,965,750.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERGUSON: On page 74, line 11, strike out "$17,965,750" and insert "$20,965,750, of which $3,000,000 shall be available only for expenditure in the field."

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, certainly, of all the services that have been rendered by the Department of Agriculture soil conservation has been acclaimed by both parties as a service that has contributed more to the national wealth than any other service in existence. The question resolves itself at this time into whether the Congress merely wants to render lip service and make political promises, or whether we want to actually deliver and make this service as effective as it might be with this increase.

This is not a case of a bureau or a department coming to the Congress and asking for an extension of its service. This increase is made necessary by the new soil-conservation districts created under State laws. The Federal Government said to the States, if you will pass legislation authorizing the creation of soil conservation districts within your State, we will furnish the technical advice and service necessary to carry on this work. As a result, 26 States have passed soil-conservation laws. A large amount of territory is included in these soil-conservation districts.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. Thirty-six States have passed such laws, rather than 26.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am pleased to have the correction.

Two hundred and seventeen districts are already organized, embracing an area of approximately 120,000,000 acres, under the care of farmers who have been interested enough to vote themselves under the restrictions of each soil-conservation district, and who are asking for the technical service to guide them in protecting the productivity of their land for future generations.

Certainly this Nation has done a better job of destroying its land than any other nation in the history of the world. We have had power machinery, we have had every modern science to help destroy the productivity of our land, until the Soil Conservation Service came into effect, when an intelligent effort was made to stop this destruction by erosion and by bad farming methods.

In spite of all the appropriations we make for insect control, in spite of all the appropriations we make for improvement in seeds, and so forth, in spite of all the improvements we have made in the technical methods of farming, in spite of the fact that we are being forced to abandon 200,000 acres every year because this land has been ruined, thus increasing the fertility of the balance of the land—in spite of these modern agencies to help improve crop production in this country in the last 60 years, agriculture has not increased the per-acre yield of a single product. With all modern science at our disposal, we are fighting a losing battle because we are taking a natural resource from the soil that cannot be replaced artificially. It is all right to talk about the use of fertilizer. Farmers were driven to it on our seaboard because they destroyed the fertility of their soil all through the southern part of this country, in the Carolinas and in the South, by poor farming methods, and they have had to go to the use of commercial fertilizer; but commercial fertilizer cannot restore the vegetative matter that it took a million years to put into the land.

For the first time in history not only do we have a Federal agency attacking this problem, but that agency has succeeded in selling to 36 States the idea of cooperating. We talk a lot about how the States should do it. That is one of the big battle cries on the left, "Let the States do it." Here we have a program that has 36 States interested enough to pass a law concerning it, and 217 districts, embracing these 120,000,000 acres, under State supervision, with only the Federal agency supplying the technical advice and knowledge necessary to terrace these lands and to restore the fertility by proper planting methods.

I hope when the vote comes on my amendment to increase this amount $3,000,000, which is still below the Budget estimate last year, in spite of the fact that many additional districts have been created, that both sides of the aisle will come to the support of this amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in the period of time necessary to allow 5 minutes for each gentleman standing, with an additional 10 minutes for the committee to close.

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I see that between 12 and 15 Members have risen, which would mean that an hour and fifteen minutes would be consumed. It is desired to complete the consideration of this bill tonight and adjourn over until Monday. A great many Members have plans for tomorrow. However, the program for next week is such that if we cannot finish this bill today we must have a session for its completion tomorrow.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we have been very liberal in debate on this bill, both in general debate and in debate under the 5-minute rule. Whatever extensions of time have been asked for have been granted in full. No one has been denied recognition, and no one has been denied all the time he desired. There has been an unusual amount of debate on this bill, an extraordinary amount considering the fact that we have always heretofore passed this bill in 3 days. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I modify my request and ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen standing be allowed 2 minutes each, and that the committee have 5 minutes to close.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair observes that the Members who have risen are Mr. POAGE, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. KLEBERG, Mr. MAHON, Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BROOKS, Mr. PATRICK, Mr. MASSINGALE, Mr. VOORHIS of California, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. MUNDT, and Mr. RANKIN.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] reminds me that he has an amendment which he desires to offer. I should like to include in my request 5 minutes for the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I should like to take up my amendment after the pending amendment has been disposed of, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] desire to have his name included in the list?

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have a separate amendment on the desk. As I understood, the chairman of the committee stated that my amendment would be taken up separately and asked that I might have 5 minutes to speak on it.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the Chairman whether I may have 5 minutes within which to offer and discuss amendments at this point following the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very glad to recognize the gentleman for the same amount of time as everyone else.

Mr. MUNDT. I wish 5 minutes instead of 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to recognize the gentleman for 2 minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I object, Mr. Chairman, to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON of Missouri) there were—ayes 74, noes 45.

So, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I may say for the information of the Members that we expect to conclude the consideration of the bill tonight, and there is a possibility of several roll calls. We will appreciate expedition and cooperation in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MUNDT. I would like to know whether by the previous vote, Mr. Chairman, a Member is deprived of his right under the 5-minute rule to offer an amendment and speak 5 minutes thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the motion just agreed to limits debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto to 40 minutes. If the 40 minutes expires, the gentleman can offer his amendment, but the amendment will not be debatable. The gentleman may debate his amendment if debate on the pending amendment does not consume the 40 minutes agreed to by the Committee.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, my colleague the gentleman from South Dakota was on his feet and was among those assigned 2 minutes. I was also listed for 2 minutes. Would it not be possible for the Chair to recognize my colleague for 4 minutes if I yield my 2 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the gentleman whether his amendment is to the amendment that is now pending?

Mr. MUNDT. It is an amendment following the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

The CHAIRMAN. It is a separate amendment from the one that is now pending?

Mr. MUNDT. That is right. As I understand, under the rules of the House, a Member has 5 minutes to speak on an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is time for debate remaining, of course, the gentleman can offer his amendment and discuss it in the time allotted to him, but the Chair has no control over that situation.

Mr. MUNDT. In other words, it is the opinion of the Chair that this motion deprives me of my right to speak for 5 minutes on my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot answer that question. It depends on whether or not all time is consumed on the pending amendment. Insofar as the present occupant of the Chair is concerned, the present occupant will place the gentleman at the end of the list in the hope that if all the time is not consumed the gentleman may have an opportunity of not only presenting his amendment but having at least 2 minutes to discuss it.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Chair, and I shall wait and hope and see what happens.

Mr. SCHAFFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFFER of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that there is no agreement to recognize the Members who stood up and asked for 2 minutes? Unanimous consent was not given to an allotment of 2 minutes' time to each one of those Members. A motion was adopted to close debate and limit the debate to 40 minutes, and, therefore, we are now operating under the 5-minute rule, and 5 minutes is allowable to those recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. In answer to the question raised by the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry, in the opinion of the Chair, the statement of the gentleman is correct. The Chair, however, in an effort to try to see that the time is equitably distributed, will, if there is no objection, recognize Members for 2 minutes each, with the exception of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], who will be recognized for 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] for 5 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFFER of Wisconsin. I reserve the right to object in view of the fact that nearly all of those rising under the proposed 2-minute arrangement are from the other side and the gag rule has now been applied. I am going to object so that we can operate under the rules of the House and the gag rule which the Committee has just voted at the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I shall attempt not to trespass upon the time of other Members. Even though I have been recognized for 5 minutes, I realize that were I to take that amount of time others who desire to be heard would get no time at all. I had hoped I might have 5 minutes on this most important subject. Several days ago I sought to be assured that I would receive full time on this one particular amendment. I regret that circumstances have arisen that make it impossible for me to take the time I so much desired without doing injustice to others.

I do not think there is an amendment to come before this House that will be as important, in proportion to the amount involved, as the amendment now before us. This soil-conservation work probably contributes more for the money expended than any other expenditure in this bill. I want to call to the careful consideration of the House a fact which I think has escaped our attention entirely. That is the fact that on the increase of this soil-conservation appropriation depends the ability of the people all over this Nation to take advantage of the newly created soil-conservation districts which have been created by 36 States in response to the insistent demand of the Federal Government. Our States have created these soil-conservation districts in direct response to the invitation and request of the Federal Government. We authorized them. We encouraged them. We promised the States that if they would establish these districts that we would aid—that we would supply the trained technical personnel which can only be supplied through the Soil Conservation Service.

Let me further direct your attention to the vital fact that under existing law these soil-conservation districts can secure W. P. A. labor to carry on soil-conserving practices whenever they can secure technical supervision at the hands of the Soil Conservation Service. To my mind this is the most equitable and the most effective system of using W. P. A. labor yet suggested. This plan is as helpful to the W. P. A. as it is to the Soil Conservation Service. It means as much to the W. P. A. laborer as it does to the farmer. It provides work for the laborer. It provides protection for the soil. It enables hundreds of districts that now feel that they cannot sponsor and do not now sponsor any W. P. A. projects to sponsor and carry on W. P. A. soil-conservation work. But this work can only be carried on; these projects can only be sponsored, these needy workers can only be employed where there is a Soil Conservation man to supervise the work. I offered the provision of the W. P. A. act to which I refer myself as an amendment to the deficiency bill on this floor almost exactly a year ago this month. My amendment provided that the W. P. A. might and should approve and carry out these soil-conserving works where supervised by the Soil Conservation Service and that they might be sponsored by any governmental agency.

The chairman of the committee at that time in charge of the bill stated that he did not want to establish any new programs in the deficiency bill, but stated that he would be glad to insert the proposal in the regular W. P. A. appropriation bill. This he did with only slight changes. The committee changed the wording so as to require not simply sponsorship by a governmental agency but instead required that the project should be sponsored by a soil-conservatory agency, meaning only a soil-conservation district set up by a State as heretofore urged by the Federal Government.

So that today, unless you provide a sufficient technical staff for the Soil Conservation Service, you have destroyed the efficiency of every soil-conservation district that has been created in the United States. You have destroyed the opportunity of the W. P. A. to carry on this work. You keep needy men idle. You allow valuable soils to wash and blow away. You break faith with the farmers of America and you create a distrust of the Federal Government that will take years to erase.

To my mind, this $3,000,000 will go farther than $30,000,000 spent in many activities for which appropriations are made in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time in order that I may be fair with other Members who want to speak.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. Yes; I will yield to my distinguished colleague from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I want to express full approval of the observations made by the gentleman, and to ask, Is there any other work that the Department has done that has been more helpful?

Mr. POAGE. None whatever.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman knows that this year there are 188 of these soil districts, and next year there will be 400 of them.

Mr. POAGE. That is right. There is not enough money in the whole $20,000,000 to provide the technical supervision that we need to keep these soil-conservation districts serving the Nation or to keep the unemployed on the W. P. A. engaged in profitable pursuits, rather than in leaf raking.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman, in order that other interested Members may be heard. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 1 minute.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, there are many Members who want to speak and I am not going to use the full 5 minutes so that some of the 40 minutes will be left for some of the others.

I want to repeat some of the things I said during general debate, because several Members were not present at that time.

The Soil Conservation Service is at the present time cooperating with approximately 190 soil-conservation districts that have been organized voluntarily by farmers throughout the country. There are other applications pending, so that by the end of this fiscal year they will be cooperating with something over 200 districts. The rate of formation of soil-conservation districts is cut so that during the coming fiscal year it is anticipated that at least 400 of those soil-conservation districts would be organized throughout the country, looking to the Soil Conservation Service for the type of technical service and help that has been given to districts already organized, and those set up under the purposes of the act.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma merely restores approximately the amount of money that is available during the present fiscal year. It will not permit the Soil Conservation Service to meet the full demands upon it, but it will allow it to carry on at about its present rate of activity.

For that reason, those of you who have any appreciation of the importance of soil-conservation work should support this pending amendment.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 3 minutes. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY].

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simply to enable the Soil Conservation Service to continue at its last year's level in field services alone.

It represents more than three and one-half million dollars less than the Soil Conservation Service says is needed to do the job. It represents about three million more than the Budget estimate.

The Budget has reduced this appropriation by three and one-half million below last year's figures. This is in spite of the fact that the work of soil conservation in the various States is just now getting well under way.

The Department was allowed twenty-one and one-half million dollars last year to service soil-conservation camps of the C. C. C., operate demonstration projects in erosion regions, and to cooperate with less than 200 State organized soil-conservation districts. The number to be served this year is double, 400.

These districts, many including several countries in 36 States, were organized at the instance and suggestion of the Federal Government to obtain State cooperation on this work of saving the soil of the Nation. The law of April 1935 provided for them and for the Federal assistance in technical help in planning.

Farmers want to cooperate. And so the new soil conservation districts that Congress invited them to organize are coming in at the rate of 15 a month. The Department estimates that for the coming year 400 will have to be serviced. When these farmers organize, agree to cooperate—they expect technicians to be furnished to show them how best to save their soil. Almost no money is spent on materials—this money goes for civil engineering and planning to hold the soil on the land.

Simply, the work of soil conservation is to hold the water on the fields where it falls—to prevent it from running off, destroying the fertility and carrying the topsoil with it to silt up the beds of bigger rivers.

It is good business and economy to do this. It is tenfold cheaper here to meet the flood-control problem than it is after the rainfall has swept through fertile areas and rushed wildly down the larger streams carrying millions of dollars in topsoil with it. If moisture is held where it falls through soil conservation—the problem of flood control, millions for dykes, levees, dams, and even irrigation will not be needed.

I know that this three and one-half million asked is not in the Budget. That is the only argument voiced against passing this amendment. No one will question that the money is not needed—it just is not in the Budget.

But in a budget bureau providing for eight thousand million dollars' worth of governmental expenditures—it would be possible, I am sure, for this badly needed three and one-half million to have been pushed aside—to have been overlooked—to not have received due consideration as to its true worth.

I am sure that this administration would not want intentionally to cripple this rapidly increasing work of preserving America's most valuable resource, our topsoil.

The effect of this reduction will be to tell the farmers of America, who after so many years of effort have been awakened to the value of soil-conservation practices—that the Federal Government just is not much interested in continuing or expanding this valuable work.

But even with a full appropriation as asked, the job that remains to be done is tremendous. So far only 120,000,000 acres have been taken into soil-conservation districts. There remain outside more than 650,000,000 acres.

Even with full resources available to those districts already organized, it will take nearly 40 years to complete the work begun. It is a continuing fight against the most destructive force of nature—erosion. I hope this Congress in seeking economy will not bring it at the expense of the 800,000,000 acres of land now eroding away.

Economy at the expense of continuing destruction of America's greatest resource, her topsoil, is short-sighted.

Far better to abolish any service of the Department of Agriculture than to make this reduction. For once lost, the fertile topsoil can never be replaced. Damage to growing things can be replaced, but our topsoil is gone forever when nature wreaks its havoc.

The House has voted more than six million for control of bugs, which probably is badly needed. But how much greater is the need for stopping now our disappearing soil.

Economy is fine. But few Members of this House would drive to the Capitol with a flat tire rather than spend 50 cents or $1 to have it repaired. Do not let us ruin the tires of agriculture—the topsoil—by refusing an appropriation equal only to that available last year. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members will see fit to increase this appropriation by the $3,000,000 asked in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I want, first of all, to say that I regret sincerely that after listening to debate on almost every subject in the world except the farm problem during this general debate it should be felt necessary by the leadership of this House to limit by gag rule to 40 minutes the discussion of one of the fundamental farm problems of America. I am sure that the farmers of this country are more interested in soil conservation than they are in the fact that this body can recess from Friday night until Monday morning. [Applause.]

However, since the gag has been once again imposed by the inevitable majority, I can do nothing but utilize the time that I have now to discuss the amendment which I shall subsequently propose when it is no longer possible to discuss the amendment then in hand.

First, I want to talk to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and other economy-minded Members of this body, and I am proud to associate myself among that group, because I think this country needs men of their type, fearless in preaching the doctrine of economy. I want to suggest, first of all, however, that this is one of the most economy-minded amendments that has been before this body for a long while. There is more, if you please, to the resources of the country than its financial resources.

When you are talking about wrecking the country from the standpoint of its Budget, we must consider along with financial resources such problems as fundamental natural resources as well as the human resources of that country. When you propose to save a measly little $3,000,000 at the cost of permitting the soils of America to erode without proper attention, that is certainly not economy. That, if you please, is scuttling the National Budget. That, if you please, is scuttling this ship of state instead of defending it as wise economists should.

I urge you, therefore, to vote for this $3,000,000, first of all as an economy measure, because by so doing we are helping to increase the flow of finances which will eventually well up in this country to balance the National Budget.

The second reason I want you to vote for this measure is from the standpoint of national defense.

Before long we are going to hear some of you Members ask the farmers to vote a large sum of money for $110,000,000 battleships, to be authorized by this same Congress. One-fortieth of the cost of one ship will give the farmers of America what they need to help conserve the basic soil and the basic resources of this country. This, too, is a matter of national defense. Napoleon once said that an army marches on its stomach first of all. The army marches on its stomach, but that stomach marches on what it has been able to secure from the fertile soil of the country. If we stop the army, if you please, by stopping the source of the food that feeds the army's stomach, we are scuttling our national defense as well as scuttling our national economy because we can make the headlines by saving $3,000,000 in some particular instance; because too many Members blindly vote for a false economy.

I urge upon you that this is not economy. I am proud of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] and of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] for the fight they are making against great odds to economize in this Congress, but I urge you to support a wise economy measure by voting to retain the soil resources of America. Those interested in forests have wisely said that if the Nation will save the trees, the trees will save the Nation. Let me paraphrase that by saying that if a nation will save its soils, its soils will save the nation.

Wars are being fought now to get fertile soils for countries that lack adequate means of producing farm products. So let us use this small additional appropriation to give this Soil Conservation Service the support so greatly needed to carry on the splendid work now being conducted.

In my amendment I refer to work being conducted by the C. C. C. camps in connection with the Soil Conservation Service, thereby linking the conservation of human resources, the conservation of natural resources, to that of the financial resources of America so we can begin to approximate something resembling a balanced budget.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I cannot yield. I have scarcely time to talk as it is under this gag-rule dictatorship of the majority. I want to say this: If my amendment can be adopted, we will be helping with a very sensible form of conservation which contributes to the national wealth and social security of the Nation by protecting and rebuilding the soil resources of this country which, after all, are the basis of all our national wealth, the source of our national income, and the foundation of our national defense. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] for 5 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again read, out of my time, for I think it might be worth while to call attention to the fact that every dollar of the money proposed to be expended will be spent in the field and not behind mahogany desks here in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERGUSON: On page 75, line 11, strike out "$17,965,750" and insert "$20,965,750, of which $3,000,000 shall be available only for expenditure in the field."

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. In the brief time that is mine I would like to call the attention of the members of the Committee to the last proviso of the Ferguson amendment. You will observe that under its provisions the extra $3,000,000 provided herein must be spent in the field. This will preclude a dollar of this extra money as provided in the Ferguson amendment being spent in the Washington office. Some of you will recall that when this measure was being considered here a year ago I endeavored to require by an amendment that more funds for the Soil Conservation Service be actually expended in the field. At that time I called attention to the fact that an entirely too large portion of the appropriation for the Soil Conservation Service was used in conserving soil in Washington, or at least conserving jobs here. I am still very much of the opinion that more funds for the Soil Conservation Service should be actually used in assisting farmers of America to conserve their precious soil. This amendment, if adopted, will actually accomplish that very thing. This simple amendment speaks for itself. It is short and to the point. It could not be misconstrued or misunderstood. If adopted, it will go far in actually securing technical and scientific information for the regularly organized soil-conservation districts throughout the country, many of which will be unable to operate unless Federal funds are forthcoming.

Here is an opportunity for Members to have this comparatively small sum go into many of the States and communities where it belongs, rather than is too often the custom of creating additional jobs for various departments, some of which are already topheavy. This proposal to add $3,000,000 funds would assist over 400 soil-conservation districts in many States of this Union.

May I not call attention further to the fact that the soil-conservation districts sought to be aided by the pending amendment are all organized under State laws? They are not Federal set-ups but are organized under your own State laws. They have local committees, and the districts are being operated by local citizens. All over the Nation farmers are organizing and demanding assistance in combating soil erosion, which they have come to realize as one of the real enemies of the American farmer for the conservation of the soil.

Much has been said during this session of Congress in support of national defense. It is not difficult to secure hundreds of millions for battleships. One can wave a flag, talk national defense, and secure fabulous sums of money from this Congress. But I submit in all seriousness that this amendment, small as it is as compared with the cost of even one battleship, constitutes real, practical, national defense. [Applause.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. May I not point out to my friend that this amount of money is only $1,500,000 in excess of the amount of money that was allowed last year. Under an act of Congress there are now 423 districts in the United States asking to cooperate with the soil-conservation program for 1941.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. NICHOLS. If we do not give them some additional sum over what they had last year, not a single one of these 423 districts that have been organized can go into operation in 1941.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I thank my colleague from Oklahoma for his valuable contribution. That is the point I was endeavoring to make. To assist farmers in conserving their soil would not make the country poorer but richer. It would not involve waste or extravagance, but the sum requested by the pending amendment would be a wise, practical investment. For my part, I prefer investing in soil conservation than in constructing huge, clumsy battleships that will take from 2 to 4 years to construct and then within a few years more will be out of date and practically useless. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCORMACK). The Chair will state that there are 21 minutes remaining. Outside of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] there are eight Members on the list now before the Chair. If there is no objection, the Chair will recognize each one of the eight Members, outside of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], for a proportionate part of the 11 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that the House voted for the gag motion of 40 minutes, I shall object. Let us follow the gag rule, which was voted for by some of the Members who have to take 2 minutes' time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I shall only take a minute. I do not believe there is a businessman or farmer, on the farm or off the farm, who would not be in favor of this amendment if he really understood the significance of it, because the only purpose of the appropriation for this particular item is to enable the States to cooperate with districts, with farmers, with counties, or parts of counties in saving, preserving, and using scientific methods in connection with utilization of the soil. It is fundamentally sound. If any man, no matter how high his tax bill may be, fully understood this amendment, he would vote for it, because he would realize it would increase the income of the Nation and contribute to the stability of our Nation for generations to come.

Let me reiterate the urgent necessity of revising this bill so that it will include adequate provision for soil conservation, the water-facilities program, the farm-tenant purchase program, and parity payments.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. Briefly.

Mr. NICHOLS. I want to point out that by previous acts of Congress and by previous appropriations we have appropriated large sums of money with which agencies of the Department of Agriculture might convince the farmers of the necessity of practicing on their farms soil conservation. After we finally got them sold on the idea, after we have set up a permanent department of Government which would show them how to do the job that we first asked them to do, now we come along, when the department that wants to do the job asks for enough money to do it, and take the money away from them. Do not let us do this thing simply to save $3,000,000.

Mr. MAHON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG.]

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I desire merely to pay my respects to the system used this afternoon and in the immediate past in expending the Nation's money for vital national interests. My hat is off to the combination of the Director of the Budget and the committee in charge of the bill in performing this function. The Congress will now take a back seat.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN].

Mr. BOREN. Already in the United States 50,000,000 acres of farm land have been completely ruined for practical and profitable cultivation. This means 320,000 farms of 156-acre average have been permanently abandoned and those farm families formerly occupying them added to unemployment. Another 150,000,000 acres have been depleted to the border line of abandonment. Three hundred thousand acres of land are abandoned in the United States annually because of soil erosion. This means that 28 farm families every day are forced to abandon farms. The eventual outcome is that that many more people are unemployed.

Despite improved farming methods, improved seed, improved methods of fertilization, the per-acre yield per family is seriously reduced annually. Soil erosion from wind and water displaces 3,000,000,000 tons of soil each year, causes 750,000,000 tons of soil to be dumped in the Gulf of Mexico annually. And yet it takes nature, under a protective cover of vegetation, some 300 to 1,000 years to build 1 inch of top soil.

At the present time we have organized operative districts for soil conservation pretty generally throughout the United States, with a very small appropriation given this gigantic task. Only skeletonized technical staffs are available in a small percentage of the districts. Soil-conservation work necessarily requires long-range planning. Under the present set-up a 30-year program should be the least we could expect for over-all results for the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK].

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I live in a nonagricultural Alabama district, where land all around frequently washes away, leaving farms impoverished; then those people come to us, and we have to take care of them in some way.

I have a little vagabond verse here illustrating a case in point, and I would like to read it:

WHO LEFT THE FARM?

The boll weevils et my cotton;
The blue jays et my corn—
That's only two of the reasons why
I left where I was born.
The turtles et my goslings;
The foxes et my geese;
My hogs left home and went hog wild
An' left me short on grease.
The hoot owls caught my chickens;
My only cow went dry.
The sheriff came an' took my farm,
An' my hoss laid down to die.
Then you ask me why I left the farm;
Why did I run away?
My friend, who left and who left who?
Where could I, should I, stay?

If we do not have strengthened soil conservation to keep these folks from washing away and starving to death, they will continue to gang up on the cities. Money spent making a farmer do more and live better at home is really economy. I therefore fully support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, may I say that the testimony shows that the Soil Conservation Service recommends the sum of $27,000,000 as being necessary for this work. Instead of appropriating that amount, the committee has reduced the Budget estimate of $20,195,000 down to $20,095,000.

I do not want to take the full time allotted me, but may I say that this is a service that will permit the farmers to do the work. It is a service that will furnish a supervision to the work now being done by the farmers. The farmers are ready, willing and anxious to voluntarily do the work of building up their soil. All that they ask from this Congress is enough money to furnish the direction in the handling of the work. I submit in connection with this great work, which has not been criticized on the floor of the House of Representatives, that they are entitled to the full amount requested by the amendment, to voluntarily perform and carry to a completion the work that has been so ably begun by the Soil Conservation Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment to be disposed of after the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] had been passed on. His amendment calls for an increase of $3,000,000 in the appropriation, and is not confined to the soil-conservation districts. The amendment I offer is to increase the Budget item $1,500,000, and make it apply exclusively to the soil-conservation districts that have been described to you by the speakers who have preceded me.

I am very much interested in the soil-conservation program. I believe Dr. H. H. Bennett, head of the soil-conservation program, has done more for agriculture than any other one man, because he has made the United States soil-conscious.

We have heard a great deal about Gone With the Wind lately, the play that is showing downtown now, but I say to you that one of the tragedies of America is the passing away of the topsoil of the country which has gone with the winds and the floodwaters of this country.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. Briefly.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman is not attempting to tell the Committee that he wants it to vote down the Ferguson amendment in order to get to his amendment?

Mr. TERRY. I certainly do not. I told the Committee a moment ago that I was in favor of the $3,000,000 amendment, but that if that amendment is voted down I want the Committee to take favorable action on my amendment to increase the amount only $1,500,000, which will only bring it up to what the appropriation for 1940 is. It does not increase it over what we have for the current year, but only brings it up to that sum.

The present Federal law gives authority to the various States in the Union to pass legislation to organize these soil-conservation districts upon the vote of the farmers of the areas affected. Out of the 48 States in the Union, 36 of them have taken advantage of that program, and this year we have 200 soil-conservation districts. Next year we will have over 400 soil-conservation districts. These districts are under the immediate supervision of the State soil-conservation committees. The farmers of the various areas of the States have the right to petition the State committee to authorize soil-conservation districts in their respective areas for the purpose of having an election to determine whether they wish to organize a conservation district.

This is most democratic. We heard a splendid address here yesterday on preserving States' rights and letting localities attend to their own business. Under this soil-conservation district legislation that democratic principle of local self-government is fully carried out.

The soil-conservation district legislation is one of the most popular measures among the farmers all over the United States, from the East to the West and the North to the South. This is not a southern measure; it covers all the States. I am going to read you the names of the States that have adopted this program, as of November 15, 1939:

Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin.

I urge you to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON], but if you do not do that, I ask that you adopt my amendment for $1,500,000. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that 7 minutes remain, with 5 minutes of that time to be reserved for the chairman of the committee.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] for 2 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I am glad of the fact that every Member from Oklahoma has either made a speech or attempted to make a speech in behalf of the Ferguson amendment. I make this statement, and I believe it is correct, that any man who knows anything about dry farming would not have the temerity to get up here and vote in favor of no appropriation for experimental purposes in dry farming and for a continuation of soil-conservation work.

Let me give you this just as an object lesson. You do not have to live in Oklahoma to get it. You can start out on a drive from Oklahoma to Washington and you can see the necessity for this kind of legislation almost as soon as you cross the Mississippi River. You get over in this part of the country, about Tennessee, and you will see the little mountains, which are cone-shaped. The farmers begin planting corn at the top of these cones and drive their mules around them laterally, so there is no soil on any cone that washes away. They raise corn to the tiptop of those cones. Such cannot be done where we have spasmodic rains, coming oftentimes in a period of a few minutes and in such tremendous volume as to amount to a waterspout. When this kind of a rain comes it washes holes in the ground and literally tears down the hillsides and where any of these hills are in cultivation neither the land itself nor anything growing on them can withstand the force of the water. These sudden rains, of such destructive force, are unknown to other sections of the country. Simply because members of the Agriculture Appropriations Committee know nothing of such conditions throughout the Middle West is no reason or justification for the committee to summarily put an end to appropriations for conserving the soil that is washed away in the West. I trust that this committee will vote this amendment to the end that the great service of soil conservation will not have to be suspended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] for 5 minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, really only 1 minute is necessary to answer these arguments, as they seem to be based on a misconception of the program. Originally, when this system was started, $25,000,000 was provided, with the understanding that the Federal Government would establish these projects in cooperation with the States because the original provision contemplated organization by the States of their own soil-conservation work, and in connection with the States they should carry along these projects, gradually shifting them, year by year, to the States. The original plan—and the plan which has been followed—was that each year the amount appropriated by the Federal Government should be reduced seriatim. As explained to the committee, they should gradually taper off so that this reduction, Mr. Chairman, is not only in consonance with the original plan but, more than that, it is $3,000,000 above the Budget estimate.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. NICHOLS. It is not $3,000,000 above the Budget estimate?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes; $3,000,000 above the Budget estimate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are various reasons why this amendment should not be adopted. The first one. Look at the form of this amendment: "Strike out $17,965,750 and insert $20,965,150, of which $3,000,000 shall be available only for expenditure in the field."

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the gentleman is speaking out of order. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], a parliamentarian and an expert on the rules, knows that under the 5-minute rule of the House he has no right to yield the balance of his time to any other Member.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yielded to the gentleman for a question and he is now answering. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has made a point of order. The gentleman from Missouri has explained that he had yielded to the gentleman from Illinois for a question, which clarifies the situation [laughter], and for that reason the Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a further point of order. The gentleman from Missouri yielded the balance of his time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and then he sat down in his seat and therefore did not have any time to yield for a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's recollection is that the gentleman from Missouri yielded to the gentleman from Illinois. It is true the gentleman sat down, from which the gentleman from Wisconsin might well draw the inference upon which he bases his point of order, but the gentleman from Missouri corrected the situation, so the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I would be pleased if the gentleman from Illinois would answer the question a little more fully.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield for a question [laughter], is it not true that this amendment will be entirely abortive inasmuch as it provides that $3,000,000 shall be available only for expenditure in the field, leaving $17,000,000 for expenditure in Washington, D. C.?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Exactly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it not true also that in this expenditure they are asking for $1,068,000 for the maintenance of erosion nurseries, with which we can dispense, at least for a time?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is the testimony of the Department.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it not true also—

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. When the gentleman from Illinois has concluded his questions.

Mr. TABER. I was wondering if this was not designed to protect the bureaucrats in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That might very well be inferred.

Mr. DIRKSEN. And is it not true also that the amount carried herein of over two and a half million dollars is for operations on lands owned or controlled by the Government, and is it not true that this will be $3,000,000 above the Budget figures? What more does it take to defeat this amendment?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Is there anything in the amendment that would place any limitation on the $17,000,000 or upon how any portion of that amount could be used in the field?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is permissive, not mandatory.

Mr. NICHOLS. If the gentleman will yield, in the gentleman's own bill it was only permissible. It was not mandatory that anything be done with the $17,000,000, and this definitely places a limitation of $3,000,000 and does not change any of the provisions of the bill that the gentleman brought here.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If the gentleman will examine the amendment, he will find it provides that most of this money is not to be used in the field, but is to be dispensed here, which is impracticable.

Mr. NICHOLS. Does not the gentleman know that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON], in preparing this amendment, discussed this thing with the gentleman and other Members of the House; and the purpose was to avoid this very thing that they are now talking about—to compel the expenditure of this $3,000,000 when it was added to the appropriation in the field, and not to affect any of the other appropriations. Did not the gentleman understand that?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We must be governed by the text of the amendment as drawn. It provides that this sum of money be spent in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NICHOLS. Oh, I never saw the gentleman unfair before in my life.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this is in keeping with the program—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERGUSON) there were ayes 82 and noes 93.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. CANNON of Missouri and Mr. FERGUSON to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 105 and noes 109.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be read again, which amendment is in perfect legal form and only raises the amount $1,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] to offer an amendment.

Mr. MUNDT. I offered my amendment to be read after the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TERRY: On page 74, line 11, strike out "$17,965,750" and insert "$19,465,750, of which not to exceed $7,791,307 shall be for cooperation with soil-conservation districts established under State laws."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TERRY) there were ayes 78 and noes 112.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MUNDT: On page 74, line 11, strike out "$17,965,750" and insert "$18,240,750, provided that $273,406 of this appropriation shall be expended for technical cooperation with C. C. C. camps in soil and water conservation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I much regret, I would be glad to yield, but we must get along with this bill, and I will have to object.

Mr. MUNDT. I offer a preferential motion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for 1 minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to say that my amendment provides for an additional $247,000 for this soil-conservation purpose, which will permit the continuation of present cooperation between the Soil Conservation Service and the C. C. C. camps, so that we can accomplish what at least a substantial minority wants to accomplish, and to do it most economically.

I hope that everybody in this House who is interested either in economy or the farmer will vote for the amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MUNDT) there were—ayes 73 and noes 122.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, salaries and expenses, Soil Conservation Service, $20,090,750, of which not to exceed $1,724,174 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia, and not to exceed $200,000 shall be available for the purchase of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of field work outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this is the sixth session that I have been a Member of this body. During that time I have taken part in many contests. I have supported many amendments which have been defeated and have supported many bills which have been defeated. I have been against many prop-sitions which have been carried. I doubt that anyone in this House is able to say that I was not always willing to take defeat, if defeat I must take, courageously. A thing happened this afternoon which I know is bad practice and bad taste. It happened to a proposition that I and great sections of the United States are tremendously interested in. I will take a fair licking any time and never squall, but I am not going to be defeated by misstatements of fact without at least calling it to the attention of this body.

When the Ferguson amendment was pending, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] was asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] if it was not a fact that under the Ferguson amendment only $3,000,000 of the $20,000,000 could be spent in the field, that the other $17,000,000 would have to be spent in the District of Columbia; and the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, to my great astonishment, answered: "That is true." I am confident the distinguished gentleman from Missouri must have misunderstood the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and I now ask the gentleman from Missouri whether or not he understood the question of the gentleman from Illinois when he made that reply.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have the highest regard for the gentleman from Oklahoma. He is one of my warm personal friends.

The amendment carried language that $3,000,000 only should be expended in the field. Under ordinary circumstances that would be interpreted by the Department which allocates this fund as inferential direction that the rest should be spent elsewhere.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman knows, as I thought he agreed with me a minute ago, that the amendment read that $3,000,000 could be spent only in the field.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I have explained to my good friend from Oklahoma my views on it and he has explained his views.

Mr. NICHOLS. Does the gentleman still contend for his interpretation of the Ferguson amendment that $3,000,000 only was to be spent in the field and that the other $17,000,000 could not be spent in the field?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. My statement was as explained.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman answer that?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am merely calling attention to the fact that it is customary in the Bureau to read an inferential direction into these words and as they could undoubtedly interpret it that the rest was to be spent elsewhere, and, of course, "elsewhere" must be the District of Columbia.

Mr. NICHOLS. I do not yield further to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman; my time is going fast.

I am more surprised by the gentleman now than I was in the first place. There is not a more intelligent man in the House of Representatives than the gentleman from Missouri. He is one of the best parliamentarians in this House, and, regardless of whether he wants to admit it, I know that he knows better than he is now trying to tell this House; and I know that he knew better at the time; and that is what I object to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of sections 7 to 17, inclusive, of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, approved February 29, 1936, as amended (16 U. S. C. 590g-590q), and the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended (7 U. S. C. 1281-1407) (except the making of payments pursuant to sections 303 and 381 and the provisions of titles IV and V), including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; rent in the District of Columbia; not to exceed $50,000 for the preparation and display of exhibits, including such displays at State, interstate, and international fairs within the United States; purchase of lawbooks, books of reference, periodicals, newspapers, $498,560,000, to remain available until June 30, 1942, for compliances under said act of February 29, 1936, as amended, pursuant to the provisions of the 1940 programs carried out during the period September 1, 1939, to December 31, 1940, inclusive; Provided, That no part of such amount shall be available for carrying out the provisions of section 202 (f) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, and not to exceed $3,000,000 shall be available under the provisions of section 202 (a) to 202 (e), inclusive, of said act, including research on food products of farm commodities: Provided further, That no part of such amount shall be available after June 30, 1941, for salaries and other administrative expenses except for payment of obligations therefor incurred prior to July 1, 1941: Provided further, That such amount shall be available for salaries and other administrative expenses in connection with the formulation and administration of the 1941 programs or plans now or hereafter authorized under section 7 or 8, or both, of said act of February 29, 1936, or under said provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, from time to time transfer to the General Accounting Office such sums as may be necessary to pay administrative expenses of the General Accounting Office in auditing payments under this item: Provided further, That such amount shall be available for the purchase of seeds, fertilizers, lime, trees, or any other farming materials and making grants thereof to agricultural producers to aid them in carrying out farming practices approved by the Secretary of Agriculture in the 1940 and 1941 programs under said act of February 29, 1936, as amended; for the reimbursement of the Tennessee Valley Authority or any other Government agency for fertilizers, seeds, lime, trees, or other farming materials furnished by such agency; and for the payment of all expenses necessary in making such grants, including all or part of the costs incident to the delivery thereof: And provided further, That the funds provided by section 32 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1935 (7 U. S. C. 612c), shall be available during the fiscal year 1941 for administrative expenses, in accordance with the provisions of section 392 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, in carrying out the provisions of said section 32, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to the employment of persons and means by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration: Provided further, That the funds appropriated under the head "Parity payments, Department of Agriculture," for the fiscal year 1940 shall remain available until June 30, 1942.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON of Missouri: On page 76, line 4, after the colon insert the following: "Provided further, That such amounts as may be necessary of this appropriation shall be immediately available to reimburse the appropriation under this head for 1940 on account of obligations created against said appropriation in connection with the 1940 grant-of-aid program, advances for the 1940 crop-insurance program, and county association expenses for the 1940 agricultural-conservation program."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered to remedy a clerical error. Through inadvertence, this paragraph, usually incorporated in the bill, was omitted.

In response to my good friend the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS], may I say I have given him my interpretation of the amendment. I do not insist that it is the correct interpretation. I lay no claim to infallibility; but certainly there was no intention to mislead. As a matter of fact, the interpretation of this phase of the amendment is wholly incidental. It was in nowise basic to the proposition, and it certainly was not the issue upon which the question was decided. The issue on which the amendment was defeated was that this additional amount was wholly outside the Budget and the program.

At the time this activity was established, $25,000,000 was appropriated with the understanding that the Federal Government would establish these demonstrational projects and then would gradually turn them over to the States. It was contemplated that at intervals there would be a reduction in the amount in order to comply with that program; and, of course, this item accepted its cut along with the rest of the bill.

The real issue, on which the House decided the question, was that they did not feel justified in increasing this one item of the bill $3,000,000 over the Budget estimate when we had denied item after item, just as meritorious, increases of $5,000 or $10,000.

That was the issue on which it was decided. I do not think it is material at all, but I assure my good friend from Oklahoma, and I assure the House, there was no intention whatever of giving any misinformation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COLE of Maryland). The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN: Page 76, line 7, after the colon, insert "Provided, further, That no total payment in excess of $1,000 shall be made to any person, firm, or corporation from the amount herein appropriated for soil-conservation payments."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. Does this refer to soil conservation?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, this is the same question that was settled in last year's appropriation bill. It places a limitation upon the size of the payments that may be made under this appropriation to any beneficiary. The matter was ruled on a year ago and held to be germane.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order until I see the amendment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to limit the benefit payments under the Soil Conservation Act to $1,000 which may be paid in any year under this appropriation to any farmer, firm, or corporation complying with the provisions of the act. At the present time a maximum payment of $10,000 is permitted under soil conservation and parity payments to any one farmer. This amendment reduces the maximum amount from $10,000 to $1,000 so that there can be no misunderstanding as to what each farmer will receive.

At the present time when we analyze the farm sections of the country we find there are over 6,000,000 farmers. The larger percentage of these farmers operate family-size farms or smaller units than the regular commercial farmer. We want this $498,000,000 soil-conservation appropriation to go just as far as it can to supplement the income of the small farmers of the United States. The small farmers are now receiving not more than $100 on an average, while there are scores of farmers receiving $10,000, the maximum amount allowed by existing law. I feel it is our duty to supplement the income of the small farmers of the country, and I have therefore offered this reasonable amendment which will give a maximum payment of $1,000 to any farmer, thereby distributing a larger percentage of the appropriation over the country.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. What does the gentleman say about a case where there are tenants on a farm and the tenants join with the landlord to receive these payments? For example, a landlord may have a farm that would pay him $2,000, but he has three tenants and he wants to divide that with them. Under the gentleman's amendment he could not do that.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That would be a very simple matter. If he has three tenants on 2,000 acres of land, that could be fixed so that each tenant would receive his proportionate share of the money.

Mr. GILCHRIST. But the gentleman's amendment would only allow the owner to get a thousand dollars instead of $2,000?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No; it would not. At the present time the law allows the amount of $10,000 to be distributed. Prior to the restriction put in the last appropriation bill there was no limitation upon the amount a farmer might receive.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I would like to go along with the gentleman if he will show me that the tenant in the case I have cited would be able to get his share of the money.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. So there might be no misunderstanding about that, if my amendment is agreed to, and I expect it to be, the matter can be clarified either in conference or in the Senate, so there will be no question about it. This amendment will give to the farmers who should receive this supplemental income because of compliance with the Soil Conservation Act their proportionate share of the amount to which they are entitled.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. In the case of these insurance companies that have multiple ownership of farms and cannot come under this program, the tenant of those farms cannot participate; is that correct?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think the tenant can, because he is operating on either a cash-payment basis or on a definite-share contract and he would get his proportionate share.

Mr. STEFAN. How would that help the insurance companies that are now precluded?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am not interested in helping the big corporations who own a lot of farms. I am interested in helping the small farmers in this country who are in a majority and who are entitled to a supplement in their income.

Mr. STEFAN. How about the small operator who is renting a farm from an insurance company?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The small operator can be taken care of. We will make it the congressional intent that he must be taken care of.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment, but I would like to have him explain this: We will assume there is a landlord who has several tenants. This landlord may have thousands of acres. Would the landlord be limited to the thousand dollars for his proportionate share under the soil-conservation plan?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The landlord could not receive more than $1,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Regardless of his acreage?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Regardless of his acreage he could not receive more than $1,000.

Mr. Chairman, I hope my amendment will be agreed to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his point of order?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 14 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Reserving the right to object, how many minutes does the gentleman allow each Member?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I modify my request and make it 19 minutes because I want to allow 5 minutes for the gentleman from Texas and 2 minutes to the other Members. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 19 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I object to that limitation.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL) there were—yeas 139, noes 21.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the unfortunate thing is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, if adopted, would accomplish just exactly the opposite of what he intends. We have some unfortunate kinks in our land system in America, but these cannot be corrected overnight. We have 2,800,000 tenants in America.

and many of them would be driven from the land if this amendment were adopted.

I am thoroughly in favor of limitation. That has to be carefully thought out if you are not to wreck things. At the present time we have a $10,000 limitation. We had a more stringent one in the bill as it passed the House, but that is the best we could get the Senate to agree to at the time. Since that time we have worked out an amendment which reduces all payments above $1,000 by 25 percent, all above $2,000 by 50 percent, and imposes a $5,000 absolute limitation, with this provision, that if the landowner operates through a tenant and takes the division which the law requires; that is, 25 percent of the payment in the case of cotton and a third in the case of wheat usually depending on the contract of tenancy, that part of the payment is exempted from the limitation. If such a safeguard is not provided, a number of these large tracts of land that are operated through tenants, a practice we want to encourage, will be changed, and the tenants will be driven to relief. Then you will have machine farming, and you will have a tremendous problem.

Let us work this out in an orderly way, and let us work it out in a just way. This House has passed the provision that sets up a limitation of $1,000 plus a reduction graduated up to $5,000, and it is properly safeguarded. That is pending before the Senate Committee on Agriculture. Senator SMITH was not here at the time. I have the promise that they are going to take up that amendment and try to work the thing out on a sound basis.

You can do things in a brash moment that will do great injury. We do not have a right to say who shall own the land or who shall not; that is a State matter. We can refrain from offering inducements. In this kind of a proposition, however, you run into grave danger of doing just the opposite of what you intend. For instance, we placed a provision in the Triple A act of 1938. We made an absolute rule that the division should not be more than a certain percentage. It was intended to help the tenant. Unfortunately, this caused some tenants to be forced off the land, and the provision needs a little modification. It is a problem that needs to be worked out carefully.

I am thoroughly in favor of limitations. I do not believe in the large payments. However, you have to remain within the realm of reason if you are going to function properly. I believe my friend from Minnesota, who has always taken an interest in this matter—and he knows that I have, also—should let us work this thing out. If we had the House bill which we have already passed and which is pending, I believe he would admit that it would go a long way toward correcting the trouble.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman for his compliment about my being interested in this matter, but the gentleman has already conceded that the bill we passed in the House was to be subject to revision over in the Senate so as to get it right. Why can we not do the same thing through this amendment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. An appropriation, I know; but this is a legislative matter and it is the business of the legislative committee in the Senate. The bill has not yet been taken up for consideration in the Senate. I have hopes that they will accept the House provision this time. I do know that if the House writes this sort of a provision in the bill you will drive a great many tenants from the land, and I know that the gentleman from Minnesota does not want to do that.

I live in the country, as do some of my friends here. We know that on some of those large tracts there are a great many tenants. On a number of tracts there are four, five, or six tenants. You cannot make the landowner come into a program. You cannot make him keep that tenant on the land. Do you want to adopt an amendment that will drive these poor tenants off the land and onto the relief rolls? I ask that you use your judgment and good sense in this matter and let us work it out in an orderly way. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. There are 15 minutes of debate remaining, under the limitation. The Chair has the names of the Members who were on their feet when the unanimous-consent request was objected to. If they desire recognition, the Chair is prepared to recognize them. These Members are Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. REES of Kansas, Mr. WHITTINGTON, Mr. STEFAN, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. GATHINGS. Five minutes of this time is reserved for the committee to close. With that understanding, the Chair will recognize these gentlemen for 2 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] for 2 minutes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I rose to my feet at the time and asked the chairman of the subcommittee to be allowed to argue this amendment.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa may have my time if he so desires.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. A motion was made to close debate and a time limit was incorporated in the motion. Therefore, under the rules of the House, we should proceed under the 5-minute rule, with each Member being allowed 5 minutes for debate. I cannot see any provision in the rules under which Members can be recognized under the 5-minute rule for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the gentleman is technically correct. The Chair is trying to accommodate all gentlemen who want to be recognized. It is within the discretion of the Members to submit to the 2 minutes allotted them if they desire to do so, and they will be recognized for that time.

The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I think with most of the Members of this House that the purpose of this amendment is good, but the trouble is that the amendment does defeat its purpose.

It is aimed at the large operator, but it hits the tenant farmer, and the reason is that if the owner's income is dependent at all upon the farm's income, under the law and under the interpretation given by the lawyers downtown, he is then, too, an operator. It does not hit the tenant farmer if the tenant farmer can pay cash for his rent, but if the tenant farmer cannot pay cash for his rent, it hits him through the operator whose farms will be out of compliance by his noncompliance. That is the reason that the objection raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to the pending amendment is absolutely sound.

This is a concrete problem in my State. We have a great many major multiple farm owners there, insurance companies, and banks. We have this much-discussed rural credits board, with 7,000 tenant farmers in my State who cannot pay cash rent in advance. If this amendment goes through it will throw out of compliance those renters who are unable to pay cash rent, unless the State rural credits board is willing to waive all the income it might expect from these farms out of these benefit payments.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have only 2 minutes, and the gentleman had 5 minutes on his amendment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. This will give them the cash rent to rent the farms.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This will not give them the cash rent, because they do not have it in advance to pay, and if they cannot pay rent cash in advance they share with the owner and, consequently, the owner is the operator, and so the gentleman's amendment hits the tenant farmer who has not the cash to pay. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of agricultural legislation is to assist both the owner and the tenant.

The contracts for all the sharecroppers of the country—and I speak from personal knowledge of the Cotton Belt—are made in the name of the landlord. If the landlord does not make the contract, not a sharecropper on his plantation will participate in this program.

If you want to injure the sharecroppers of the Nation, adopt this amendment. If you want to promote the good that the soil-conservation program is doing for the landlord and the tenants, follow the course suggested by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. He has called our attention to the fact that there is a legislative bill already adopted by the House and now pending in the Senate that provides for justice between the landlord and the tenant with respect to the limitation of the payments, but if this amendment is adopted it provides that the total payment shall not exceed $1,000, and the landlord with sharecroppers or tenants simply will not sign up for the program, and the result will be that the tenants or the sharecroppers in the Cotton Belt will be denied soil conservation.

There is a difference between a limitation on the soil-conservation payments and on the parity payments. In my judgment, the adoption of this amendment would defeat the program of soil conservation and would result in great injustice to the sharecroppers and tenants as well as the landowners.

In extension of my remarks I remind the Committee that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] is proposing an amendment similar to the one that was defeated a year ago. The amendment is provincial; it might be suited to soil conservation in dairying—sharecroppers and crop tenants do not abound. Soil conservation, however, is needed where the soil-depleting crops like cotton, corn, and wheat are raised. All must participate in the program or the program will fail.

Under the act the tenants and sharecroppers now receive more than 50 percent of the soil-conservation payments. Many millions of dollars are set aside so as to increase the smaller payments. A definite yardstick then prevails for the payment of other benefits.

The purpose of the payments is to control crop production as well as to provide for soil conservation. If the owner of large operations is denied benefits such an owner will not cooperate. Sharecroppers and renters will obtain no benefits unless the landlord cooperates. After all, a large plantation or a large operator is nothing more nor less than an aggregation of small farmers for tenants and sharecroppers can only raise so much cotton and so much corn. If the owner of the plantation refuses to cooperate his tenants will receive no benefits.

All should be treated alike, whether landlords or tenants. The large operator and the small operator are entitled to equivalent benefits. It might as well be argued that because a day laborer works for $3 a day no executive of a large institution should receive a larger compensation.

The adoption of the amendment would destroy the Soil Conservation Act.

If the gentleman from Minnesota who has opposed the Agricultural Adjustment Act were consistent, he would insist that the aggregate tariffs to no one manufacturer should exceed $1,000. If there is to be a limitation on the large farmer, there should be a limitation on the large manufacturer.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, when I came down here a year ago I introduced an amendment which would take care of the tenants as well as the landlords on this proposition.

The statement of the last two gentlemen and of the chairman of the committee is absolutely correct—namely, a landlord will not go into this program if he can get only the $1,000, and therefore his tenants will not be permitted to go into the program. The landlord will simply say, "No," and instead of being tenants they will be sharecroppers, and he will get all the money that will be allowed or he will stay out of it.

This amendment, as was stated by the last gentleman, defeats its own purpose. What we want to do is to protect the small man—protect the tenant by allowing the landlord to go in and then the tenant will get to go in and get his share. For example, we have insurance companies that have as many as 100 farms in my State. They could not go into the agricultural program under this amendment, but if they could rent the farm in family-sized farms under proposals that have been made and are pending in the Senate, then the landlord would go into the program and his tenant, the poor fellow, could get the benefit of the soil conservation; but this amendment absolutely forecloses this. It says that no man can get more than $1,000 in any event; so the larger landlords will not participate, and his tenants will not be permitted to.

The distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] said, in answer to my question, "Well, let the Senate fix it; let the committee fix it"; and that is what will have to be done if this House passes this amendment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Certainly.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I said the Senate should fix it up if there is any doubt in the gentleman's mind that it would not take care of the situation, and it can be fixed up in the Senate. They fixed it up last year.

Mr. GILCHRIST. They have not passed the law yet, my dear friend, and they have not fixed it at all; but it is pending there now. This is a dangerous amendment. It despoils and robs tenants, not landlords. [Applause.]

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Certainly.

Mr. STEFAN. I am very much interested in this matter of multiple ownership from the standpoint of the small operator and the renter. I know that the gentleman from Iowa has always fought the battles on this floor for the real dirt farmer and is as interested as I am in getting money distributed so that the real farmer gets his rightful share. I have many letters from farmers in my district on this subject of the $10,000 limitation, and I am glad that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, of which my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] is also a member, assures us that the committee is working out this problem so that the real farm operator and real farmer will be taken care of. In working out this problem I hope you gentlemen will look into the matter of the cash rents our renters must pay for pasture and the ground on which the home is located, which sometimes results in cutting down the amount of benefit payments actually received by tenants or renters. I have many complaints about this item and hope it can be straightened out.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, the way I look at this proposition there is not anyone in the world who will get hurt except the big farmers—the big corporation farmers. We sit here day after day and we hear about the family size farms, and what time we are not talking about the family size farms we are talking about tenants. I have come to the conclusion that that is about the only class of people we think about—the tenants on the farms. If we are not careful with our agricultural problems, we will have 6,000,000 of them.

There are many sections in which we have family size farms where a man owns and operates it himself. He should have some consideration and is entitled to more of these funds. It seems to me that $1,000 is a pretty good price to pay any one individual or any corporation for carrying on a farming operation that he ought to know enough to carry on without getting paid for it.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] is recognized.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment to limit the payment to any one person, firm, or corporation to $1,000. I rise more especially in behalf of that great group of farmers who, in my opinion, have not received their fair share of the benefits, as was in the first place intended. You will hear plenty of oratory on behalf of the big operator—and I want him accorded fair treatment—but you will hear little said for the farmer who operates his own farm and is trying to work out a living for his family and himself.

Let us admit that, after all, the payments under the Soil Conservation Act are really for the purpose largely of assisting farmers who do not receive fair prices for their crops as compared with the prices they are required to pay for the things they buy, as well as to help them through crop failures. At the same time it does a lot of good in providing conservation of the soil. It has done little in the way of regulation of surpluses. So many other factors enter into that proposition. The question of climate, rainfall, floods, droughts. I believe that, generally speaking, farmers want these payments by reason of adverse conditions. It is a fact that the American farmer has not had a square deal in the matter of his income. I want now to direct your attention to a situation that I do not believe is justifiable. Under this act you are appropriating about the same amount as was allowed last year. If it is handled about as it was in 1938, here is about the way it will work out: Under the 1938 program it took, in round numbers, $48,000,000 to administer the act. That includes the expenses through the Department direct as well as that spent in the various counties. I do not claim that the farmers on the county committees were overpaid. I do think the machinery required for administering the act from top to bottom is unnecessarily extravagant.

Now, let me direct your attention to some figures for just a moment. In 1938 we appropriated $500,000,000 for the soil-conservation program. It is estimated that $418,630,202 was paid to farmers. It is estimated that it took about $48,000,000 to pay for administering the act. Now, then, listen to this: Five million two hundred and thirty-one thousand three hundred and twenty-four farmers participated. Of this number, 1,252,186 farmers got less than $20 each; 1,182,387 got between $20 and $40 each. In other words, 2,434,575 farmers in this country got just about $48,000,000. One-half of our farmers got just about as much as it took to pay for administering the act. Do you really think that is fair, in view of your statement that you really want to help the farmer? We might go on just a little further. I am sorry I do not have time to place all these figures in the RECORD. Eight hundred and forty-two thousand two hundred and forty-seven of our farmers got between $40 and $60; 889,413 received between $60 and $100. In other words, you pay 4,166,233, or about four-fifths of our farmers, on an average of probably less than $50 apiece, and then you pay the rest of it to the other one-fifth who do not need it. If you think there is a surplus, is it not that other one-fifth, the big operator, who makes such surplus?

Mr. Chairman, it just is not right. If you will stop and think about it just a little, and use your common sense, you will admit that it is not right to levy taxes to raise these millions of dollars, and the farmer will have to pay his share of these taxes, and then expend a large part to those who do not need it.

We need the thing that I have advocated many times on this floor—that is to see that the farmer who operates his own land, his family-sized farm, if you please—is given decent and fair protection; allow him reasonable payments for the actual conservation of his soil during the times of depression and drought; and give less attention to the large operators of this country who are now receiving payments in the thousands of dollars—money paid by the taxpayers of this country.

There are estimated to be approximately 2,800,000—approximately 40 percent—tenant farmers in this country. Of course, we need more home owners and fewer tenants. I do not think the farmers of this country want subsidies if it can be prevented. They want fair prices for their products in comparison with the price they have to pay for the things they buy. Our farmers want to make a fair and decent living for their families and themselves. The farmer wants and is entitled to supply the American market so long as he can do it on a fair and reasonable basis. While we are talking about the farmer, he just cannot get along if he is expected to pay from 25 to 30 percent of his income for taxes.

You are going to defeat this amendment. You have the votes to do it. I do hope the committee will, before the close of this session, see to it that legislation is proposed that gives the farmer a fairer deal than is provided in this bill. I regret that we were not given more time to discuss this very important matter. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment is not adopted. There should be a fair and reasonable limitation on benefit payments, but this is not the way to do it. This House has nearly always, at least a majority of it, followed the advice and suggestions of the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas, Hon. MARVIN JONES. I think we have done it with safety and with good judgment. The results have proved that he knows his business. Now he gives us his personal assurance that the legislative Committee on Agriculture is working out this problem. So I say it would be unfair and unwise to attach a rider like this on an appropriation bill.

As has already been stated by several of the speakers, the amendment would defeat its own purpose. I am sure this would be true in my part of the country. You would drive tenants from the farm rather than attract them to the farm. In addition to that, there is not 1 percent of the tenants of the country who could pay cash rent under any circumstances. But, more than that, in my section of the country, where the farming is nearly all done by irrigation, those farm owners have to pay high ad valorem taxes. They have to pay high water taxes. They have to pay a great many other charges. The land is of high value, and it requires intensive and scientific farming. There are few tenant farmers in that kind of a country. I appeal to all those from irrigated sections to oppose this amendment. Most farms in an irrigated section must of necessity be operated by owners on more or less of a day-labor basis. In the irrigated valley where I live I have heard no objection to the treatment accorded to the men who rent or work by day labor on the farms. Much of the work has to be done by seasonal labor. Tenants cannot buy that high-priced land, neither can they buy the expensive machinery necessary to farm it. It requires capital or credit to operate that kind of farming. The average tenant cannot meet the requirements. To say that a man who owns an expensive farm such as we find in the irrigated country where the value is three or four times what it would be in a nonirrigated country is to be penalized, is unfair and unjust. Let us work out some fair legislation on this subject and not act in haste.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield my time to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. I just want to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], a question or two.

For instance, in my own State, participation in the agricultural-adjustment program and soil-conservation program, according to my information, is from 95 to 98 percent of the farmers. We have in that State the large farm units. The way the owners of those large tracts are operating is through tenants.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Through tenants or hired labor. Some operate through hired labor and machinery. Under the legislation we are working out, that would take away from the man who operates through machinery or hired labor.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Here is what I am getting at—the gentleman made the statement—and I have as high regard for the gentleman's capacity along the line of handling farm problems as any Member of this House—I respect his judgment very highly—but does the gentleman feel that if this amendment were to be adopted, that it would cause the owners of these large tracts of land to let the land remain idle rather than rent it and not enjoy the full participation in soil-conservation payments? Would they not take their chance on getting what they could rather than leave the land idle?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not familiar with conditions in the gentleman's State. I am familiar only with conditions in my own section of the country where they have great numbers of tenants. This would absolutely drive the tenants from the land, in my judgment, in practically all the large areas. Some operators who used to have a great many tenants have gone in for tractor and machine farming. If you deny the others the benefits of the soil-conservation program they, of course, will be inclined to go into machine farming even more extensively, in my judgment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman feels that the large farmers would hire help rather than have tenants?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I believe they would.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That they would do away with the tenants?

Mr. JONES of Texas. In most instances.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I may say to the gentleman that if a corporation or an insurance company owned 100 farms and made 100 contracts with 100 tenants, on all those contracts the insurance company would not get a total of more than $1,000, but every tenant would get his proportionate share of the crop under contract.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The fact remains I have on my desk petitions signed by hundreds of tenants protesting even the rigid division between landlord and tenant that we have in the present law and saying that they are being driven from the farm.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. They are being driven from the farms down through the large plantation sections where the owners had sharecroppers. It is not due to any hiring of day labor.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is not the large plantations only, but they apply to a great many where they have three, four, and five tenants.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not in favor of large payments going to individual owners of great tracts of land. These payments should be cut down.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I believe the House has already passed a bill that does the job very well. I believe it passed at the last regular session.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired; all time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN) there were—ayes 93, noes 98.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN and Mr. CANNON of Missouri.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 104, noes 110.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am wondering if the gentleman intends to finish this bill this evening. A great many Members have spoken to me about it. Many of us are tired and hungry.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I take for granted the gentleman was absent when the announcement was made a little earlier in the afternoon. It is the intention of the Committee to complete the bill tonight. The Members who have discussed the matter with me prefer to stay a little later tonight rather than to come back tomorrow.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FADDIS) there were—ayes 12, noes 95.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PACE: On page 77, at the end of line 19, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to market agricultural commodities for domestic consumption and for export as authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 and the declared policy of the Congress as set forth in said act; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute surplus agricultural commodities for relief purposes as provided in section 204 of said act; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make 'other payments' authorized by section 391 of said act, that is, payments in assisting consumers to obtain an adequate and steady supply of such commodities; and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to administer and carry out the purposes of said act and the declared policy of the Congress in the enactment thereof, $72,678,812: Provided, That not in excess of 25 percent of the funds herein made available may be devoted to any one agricultural commodity."

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It is clearly without authorization of law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] desire to be heard?

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, may I say that this is not an amendment in language similar to the appropriation for surplus commodities carried in the 1940 appropriation bill. That amendment carried $113,000,000 as an expansion of section 32, with which we are all familiar, and would probably be subject to a point of order. May I say further, Mr. Chairman, that in my opinion and in the opinion of a great many Members of the House this item is one of the most important and necessary items carried in this legislation.

In determining the point of order the Chair should consider the purpose of the Congress in enacting the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 and the language used in said act. I submit that the authority for this amendment, the authorization for it, is contained not in section 32, which is not a part of the Agricultural Adjustment Act itself, but is expressly contained in the language of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. In determining that question, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary for me to refer briefly to the purposes of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. That is, the condition that existed prior to the enactment of the act of 1938 and the remedy that the Congress adopted to correct that condition.

Very briefly, the condition that brought about the enactment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act was this: We had had an enormous crop in 1937. The season had been good. In the wheat fields of the West, the crop was so enormous that there were not sufficient storage facilities available for the storage of the wheat. In the Southland there had been produced the greatest cotton crop in the history of the world, approximately 19,000,000 bales, or 7,000,000 bales more than a normal crop. While there was this enormous surplus, it was found that farmers were facing bankruptcy and there were millions of people in this Nation, some of them living within sight of the wheat fields, others living within sight of the cotton fields, who did not have enough food to eat or sufficient clothing to wear. In the face of this situation the Congress was convened by the President of the United States in special session on November 15, 1937, to correct this condition. We labored here until December 20, we adjourned for the Christmas season, returned in early January, and finally on February 16, 1938, the President affixed his signature to the act which was passed to correct this condition. It was enacted to reduce the surpluses and to make those surpluses available for the needy of this Nation who lived in sight of plenty, yet did not have clothing to wear nor food to eat.

That, I submit, Mr. Chairman, was the purpose of the Congress in the enactment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I call the Chair's attention to the purpose or policy of the Congress as set out in the act itself. Among others, the Congress declared that the purpose of this act is to assist in the marketing of agricultural commodities for domestic consumption and export, and assist consumers to obtain an adequate and steady supply of such commodities at fair prices.

To show that it was the purpose of the Congress to provide funds identical with what this amendment is offered for—that is, to distribute surplus commodities among those on relief and to those in need—I call the Chair's attention to page 9 of the act, section 204, where this Congress, carrying out its declared purpose, extended the act of June 28, 1937, which was enacted for the purpose of distributing surplus agricultural commodities for relief purposes, and to continue the Federal Surplus Commodity Corporation. That, I submit, Mr. Chairman, is clear evidence that the Congress intended this act to set up machinery to aid the farmers in disposing of their surplus commodities and to aid those in need in order that the commodities might be distributed among them.

Mr. Chairman, then what did the Congress do? It provided an authorization for such funds on page 43 of the A. A. A., and I would like to read that authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 391?

Mr. PACE. Section 391 (a). Here is the language of the authorization:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the administration of this act—

That is one thing—

for the payments of soil-conservation payments—

That is a second thing—

and other payments, such sums as Congress may determine.

The claim might be made by the gentleman who makes the point of order that this is broad language. I respectfully submit it is broad and it is all comprehensive. I do not know that the Congress knew what it was doing when it wrote that language. Some of the Members did, and the language is in the law. It was put there, I respectfully submit, for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the act. That is, to authorize the Congress in its discretion, as the terms of the section state, to appropriate such funds as might be necessary to carry out the act.

Mr. Chairman, as a further authority I want to cite the Chair to a ruling made on yesterday.

I sat here and watched with interest and listened with much comfort to the ruling of the Chair on the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]. The gentleman from North Carolina offered an amendment to appropriate $30,000 for the application of methods for the prevention of dust explosions. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] made the point of order that it was not authorized by law. I also listened with much comfort to the admission of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, who now makes this point of order, that that appropriation was authorized by the organic law.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to read the organic law which authorized, in the view of this Chair and in the view of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, an appropriation of $30,000 for the prevention of fires in grain elevators. This is the organic law the Chair cited as authority for holding the amendment was not subject to the point of order:

There shall be at the seat of government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and purpose of which shall be to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, it was under that section that the Chair ruled—and the gentleman from Missouri admitted that it was correct—that there was authorization for an appropriation of $30,000, not to diffuse information, as mentioned in this section, but for the application of modern methods of preventing fires in grain elevators.

I submit that I am making an effort here to secure funds for two purposes. One is the reduction of the enormous surpluses that exist on the farm—of wheat, of lard, of citrus fruit, of cotton, and of corn—in order that we may reduce the surplus available on the market and thereby increase the farmer's price. The second purpose is to take those commodities and distribute them under the system adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture to those who are without sufficient food to eat or clothes to wear.

Certainly neither this Chair nor the Congress would want to be put in the position of holding that under the organic law, which was passed at a time when an elevator fire had never been heard of, very probably, this Congress can appropriate $30,000 to increase the profits of an elevator operator, but that under an act that was drawn and passed for the sole and single purpose of doing exactly what this amendment seeks to do there is no authorization for such an appropriation.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that neither the Congress itself nor the gentleman who makes this point of order would want to be put in the position of making such an unreasonable, unfair, and unjust interpretation of these two respective laws. We have a law here that was enacted for a particular purpose. Its purpose is declared. We have a law here that was enacted to correct a certain evil. The evil is described. We have the authorization in express terms of the law itself to make such appropriations as the Congress may determine are necessary to meet that situation.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that, while the point of order would lie to an amendment to section 32, under the declared purposes of the Congress under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, under the language of that act itself, there is ample and abundant and compelling authority that will justify this amendment being held in order at this time, and I respectfully invoke that ruling of the Chair. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, an experienced parliamentarian, has submitted a very able argument. The gentleman bases his contention that this amendment is authorized by law on several provisions of law, but I believe we may dispose of all of them, with the exception of the citation to section 391, under the long-established doctrine that an authorization of an appropriation or law must be construed strictly, and where there is any legitimate doubt that doubt must be resolved in the negative.

This leaves the citation to part 2 of the act of 1935, and the gentleman refers to this phrase in section 391, subtitle A, "and other payments." The gentleman's contention is that "other payments" may include a payment for the purchase of surplus commodities; but, Mr. Chairman, that is a familiar phrase, and it has been repeatedly construed.

If the gentleman's contention were sustained that the words "and other payments" would admit his amendment, it would invite chaos. There is no appropriation that could be suggested that would not be admissible under that interpretation of the phrase. We could include in this bill under that interpretation of section 391 an appropriation in defense of Finland or to free Ireland.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. Does the gentleman believe that is even a reasonable interpretation, when it is clear that the "other payments" refers to matters covered by the title and purpose of this act? Under no construction could you go outside the act, but as long as you stay within the act it is within the discretion of the Congress. Do not carry me across the water; I have enough trouble right here. Here is where the people are.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman takes himself across the water, and very deep water at that, for this phrase has been often construed and has always been held to mean "other payments" as provided in this act. Of course, that excludes any such appropriation as that proposed in the pending amendment.

I submit, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Fortunately for the Chair, this proposition was presented to him on yesterday, and he has had an opportunity to thoroughly consider and study the matter. For this privilege the Chair thanks the gentleman from Georgia.

The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment which has been reported by the Clerk and to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has raised a point of order on the ground that the appropriation for the activity contained in the amendment is not authorized by law. It has been suggested to the Chair that by reason of section 204 of the Agriculture Adjustment Act of 1938 the activities of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation has been continued until June 30, 1942, and that, therefore, an appropriation for the purchase and distribution of surplus agricultural commodities is thereby authorized. It will be observed, however, that the act of June 28, 1937, which was continued by section 204, in turn had amended and continued some provisions of section 32 of the act of 1935. Upon examination of section 32 of the act of 1935 it will be found that the only money made available for the purposes of that section is provided for by a so-called permanent appropriation mathematically fixed in the section itself. It does not appear from the original act—that is, section 32 of the act of 1935, nor the act of June 28, 1937, nor section 204 of the Agriculture Adjustment Act of 1938—that any additional appropriation is authorized.

Attention should also be directed to the language of the amendment wherein the appropriation is stated to be for the purpose of carrying out the "declared policy of Congress" as set forth in the Agriculture Adjustment Act of 1938. The Chair does not think that it can be seriously contended that a declaration of policy set forth in an act of Congress specifically authorizes an appropriation therefor.

The contention has been made that section 391 of the Agriculture Adjustment Act of 1938 is a blanket authorization for any appropriation that Congress may see fit to make. The Chair will read the pertinent provisions of that section, and they are as follows:

SEC. 391. (a) Beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, for each fiscal year for the administration of this act and for the making of soil conservation and other payments such sums as Congress may determine, in addition to any amount made available pursuant to section 15 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended.

It has been urged upon the Chair that the words "and other payments" in the section just read is sufficient authorization for the appropriation provided in the pending amendment. The Chair, however, does not believe that these words could possibly be construed in such a broad sense. Certainly if the Chair did place such a construction upon them those words could be interpreted as authorizing appropriations for any activities of the Government that the fertile imagination of man could think of. It would not be limited to the Department of Agriculture or its activities, but would apply to all activities that the Federal Government might possibly enter into. Indeed, if such a construction were placed upon those words it would be unnecessary for any of the legislative committees of the House to ever bring in an authorizing act. It seems to the Chair that it will be readily apparent to all Members that there was no such intent to do that when the Congress passed the Agriculture Adjustment Act in 1938. The Chair thinks that this paragraph should be construed in the light of the custom and practice of the House in years past. It seems to the Chair that the meaning of the words "and other payments" contemplates only such payments as are authorized in the act itself. In other words, the Chair thinks that the words "and other payments" are limited solely to those payments authorized in the act. Upon further examination of the act, the Chair finds that in section 303 specific authorization is made for parity payments, and the Chair is compelled to conclude that the words "and other payments" occurring in section 391 have reference to the payments authorized under section 303 and similar payments if authorized in the act.

For the reasons stated, the Chair therefore thinks that the appropriation contained in the amendment is not authorized by law, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Salaries and administrative expenses: Not to exceed $2,000,000 of the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation, established as an agency of the Government by Executive Order No. 6340, dated October 16, 1933, and continued as such agency to June 30, 1941, by the act of March 4, 1939 (53 Stat. 510), shall be available during the fiscal year 1941 for administrative expenses of the Corporation, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, in accordance with the Standardized Government Travel Regulations and the act of June 3, 1926, as amended (5 U. S. C. 821-833); printing and binding; lawbooks and books of reference; not to exceed $250 for periodicals, maps, and newspapers; procurement of supplies, equipment, and services; typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their repair and exchange; rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and all other necessary administrative expenses: Provided, That all necessary expenses (including legal and special services performed on a contract or fee basis, but not including other personal services) in connection with the acquisition, operation, maintenance, improvement, or disposition of any real or personal property belonging to the Corporation or in which it has an interest, including expenses of collections of pledged collateral, shall be considered as nonadministrative expenses for the purposes hereof: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may make allotments from this appropriation, subject to the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, to the offices and divisions of the office of the Secretary for the performance of departmental services for the Commodity Credit Corporation: Provided further, That none of the fund made available by this paragraph shall be obligated or expended unless and until an appropriate appropriation account shall have been established therefor pursuant to an appropriation warrant or a covering warrant, and all such expenditures shall be accounted for and audited in accordance with the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, as amended.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON of Missouri: Page 79, after line 9, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"THE SUGAR ACT OF 1937

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions, other than those specifically relating to the Philippine Islands, of the Sugar Act of 1937, approved September 1, 1937 (7 U. S. C. 1100-1183), and the employment of persons and means, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as authorized by said act, $47,500,000: Provided, That conditional payments in connection with the 1940 sugar program shall not be made if, by proclamation under section 509 of said act, title II or title III shall have been suspended and shall remain suspended until July 1, 1940."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, may I reserve a point of order against the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida reserves the point of order.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this merely restores to the bill the provision which has been carried for several years. It was removed by the subcommittee and by the whole committee under a misapprehension at the hearings when no one appeared in behalf of the provision and the fact that at the time of the departmental hearings it was under consideration in the committee and the quotas had been suspended. Only those who favored the elimination of this item appeared before the committee. Both the producers and the consumers seemed to think it ought to be taken out of the bill, and in view of the fact that the quotas were suspended at the time and everybody appeared to be very happy over that fact. Furthermore, the committee thought that it would not be necessary—could yield to the sentiment adduced in the evidence—in view of the fact that the law authorizing the appropriation expired this year.

However, since that time, Mr. Chairman, the quotas have been restored, and as under this law $67,000,000 is being collected from the sugar producers and even the full payment of the quota involves a matter of only $48,000,000, the committee, on reconsideration, authorizes me to submit the pending amendment and to recommend that it be again included in the bill as in former years.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am not sure I understood the gentleman from Missouri. Did I hear him say that the committee on reconsideration had authorized the gentleman to offer the amendment?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is correct. The subcommittee held an informal conference and they authorized me to offer the amendment as indicated.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I amend the request to make it 18 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object—

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri, as modified?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I do not think we can discuss this question in 18 minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Florida is right in his contention. The time is wholly insufficient to discuss this question, but in view of the fact that we will give them an opportunity to extend their remarks, I should greatly appreciate it if each Member will be content with the 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 18 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PETERSON].

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to oppose any appropriation to any agricultural group, but this sugar system is wrong.

We operate under a quota system, which in Florida does not allow us to raise as much sugar as we use in Florida. I am appealing to those Members who represent consumers. I bring to your attention this fact, that the Secretary of Agriculture has officially stated that it cost the consumers of the United States last year $350,000,000 above the world market to subsidize the sugar industry. If you will examine the benefit payments, you will find that those payments did not go to the small farmer or the family sized farmer. You will find benefits running into hundreds of thousands of dollars, benefit payments running into approximately millions of dollars, benefit payments to Hawaii and Puerto Rico with many payments running into hundreds of thousands of dollars; and the consumers of this country paid it.

The Secretary of State estimated at current prices American consumers are obliged to pay more than $350,000,000 above the world market in a single year.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have the minute and one-half that may be yielded to me by my colleague the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS].

Mr. HENDRICKS. If I may do so, I will be glad to yield my time to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for an additional minute and a half.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. This is equivalent to a tax of approximately $2.70 per capita on a population of 129,000,000. It means on an average a levy of more than $10 per family, including that one-third of the Nation which is ill-nourished, and it represents an amount of purchasing power equal to more than 50 quarts of milk and 50 loaves of bread for each family in the United States.

We are not asking for subsidies in Florida. We are asking for the right to raise sugar. We are interested not only that the American market may belong to the American producer but that the American consumer may have a fair deal.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Does the gentleman think it is right to keep this tax on the sugar producers and repeal the benefits provided in the act?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. If the benefits are not paid, the tax will fall, because it will not be continued.

Mr. COOLEY. Is it not a fact that they will be receiving millions of dollars off of the producers of sugar in this country, in the off-shore possessions, and retaining it in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. This is the last year of the processing tax. In Colorado, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, California, and other sections it is not going to the family sized farmer. It is going to the big farmer, the corporate farmer. Every congressional district in the United States is paying the bill.

I appeal on behalf of American labor, the American farmer, and the American consumer. That is where it hits each and every one of you. There is no need to pay that benefit payment. There is no need for that subsidy.

Vast areas in Florida and in the reclamation projects of the West are available to raise sugar. Yet they cannot get the desired quotas.

Here is your chance to economize to the tune of nearly $50,000,000. I hope you will vote this amendment down. The iniquity of this thing is the quota system, a quota system placed when the American producer is not raising sufficient for the American consumers. If you analyze this statement which I read to you coming from the Secretary of Agriculture it shows that from the $350,000,000 which we are paying above the world market we receive no benefit. Any quota system which denies the right of American labor and the American farmer to produce goods which can be used in this country, where production is less than consumption, is wrong.

I hope you will vote the amendment down. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. COFFEE] is recognized for 1½ minutes.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want first to thank the chairman of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations for offering this amendment to carry out the obligation of the Government to the domestic sugar-beet and cane growers. Florida is the only sugar-producing State opposing this amendment. I am sure you recognize the justice of this amendment.

Answering my friend, the gentleman from Florida, let me say that the consumers of the United States have been getting the lowest-priced sugar during the last 3 years that they have had during any 3-year period in history. The excise tax on sugar became effective September 1, 1937. During the 18 months previous to the imposition of the excise tax, the retail price of sugar was 5.6 cents per pound. During 1938 the average price was 5.3 cents per pound and during the first 6 months of 1939 it was 5.2 cents per pound—within one-tenth of a cent per pound of the all-time low figure reached in 1932. This shows conclusively that the tax was not passed on to the consumer but was borne by the sugar industry itself.

Under the law, all sugar processed before June 30, 1941, is subject to the excise tax of 50 cents per hundred. The producers and processors have paid this tax which must be returned to the growers unless you want to destroy the sugar industry in this country. The bill that carried the tax carried the obligation of the Government to make the payments to the growers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute of my time to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman has no minute to yield, under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. In this instance we are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement.

The point of order is overruled.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska for 1 additional minute.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the Federal Government is collecting about $68,000,000 a year by virtue of this processing tax on sugar and the total amount that is to be paid back to the growers, as estimated and recommended by the Budget, is $47,975,000—the amount involved in this amendment. This leaves a net revenue to the Federal Treasury of over $10,000,000 after the tax on Philippine sugar is refunded.

While the Sugar Act is not perfect and needs amending to provide for an expansion of the domestic sugar industry, the program is on a self-sustaining basis. The sugar industry, like many other industries in this country, cannot survive without protection. The tariff alone will not do the job. It is necessary to have a combination tariff and quota. The excise tax and payments to growers are essential in maintaining quotas.

I am sure the consumers in this country have not forgotten the experience during the last World War when they were at the mercy of foreign combinations and had to pay 20 cents and 25 cents a pound for sugar. A healthy expansion of our domestic sugar industry is the only way to protect the American consumer against unreasonable price demands in the future.

The Federal Treasury is in need of this revenue. The growers are entitled to this money. Support this amendment in the interest of economy and fairness to our domestic producers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KING] for 1½ minutes.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, of all the various benefits extended to agriculture, the conditional payment to the producers of sugar beets and sugarcane is the only one that comes from the industry itself. The processing taxes collected from the processors of sugar and, in part at least, deducted from the payments made by such processors to the producers greatly exceed the amount of the conditional payments made to the producers, leaving a very substantial sum in the Treasury of the United States.

Payments to growers of sugar beets or sugarcane under the Sugar Act of 1937 are made upon the basis of compliance with certain conditions set forth in the law. They are not gratuities but are earned by compliance with conditions deemed to be in the public interest and essential to the success of the sugar program. Large-scale producers have a greater number of units of compliance and hence receive larger aggregate payments, although at a lesser rate per unit due to the schedule of reductions incorporated in the act.

The cost of the sugar program is borne by the producers and is not a tax upon consumers. The following table illustrates this point by statistics for years when the processing or excise tax was in effect compared with years when there was no such tax:

[Cents per pound]

² Bureau of Labor Statistics, U. S. Dept. of Labor.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics, in a report published in 1937, said:

Since the total quota for sugar was completely filled each year, the quota system definitely limited the quantity of sugar made available for sale in the United States, regardless of the processing tax. Consumers would pay only a given price and aggregate amount for such a quantity, depending upon the existing state of demand, which is largely influenced by consumer purchasing power. Therefore, the tax did not affect the retail price in any way, at least over any appreciable period of time, and so could not have been passed on to consumers. (P. 67, "An analysis of the effects of the processing taxes levied under the Agricultural Adjustment Act," published 1937.)

Since the tax was not borne by consumers or by refiners or distributors of cane sugar, and apparently was not borne by the manufacturers of raw sugar, it follows that the grower of cane sugar, as the residual element in the situation, did bear the burden of the tax as such. (Idem, p. 70.)

The Secretary of Agriculture said in 1937:

One is likely to assume that excise taxes increase prices under all conditions; but an excise tax on sugar, within certain limits, under a quota system is one of the exceptions. (Statement on Sugar, by Secretary Wallace, March 15, 1937.)

Payments to sugar producers are made upon proof of compliance with conditions set forth in the act and determinations made pursuant thereto by the Secretary. Among these conditions are the following:

Prohibition of child labor.

Payment of not less than prescribed minimum wages.

Marketing or processing sugar beets or sugarcane not in excess of the proportionate share for the producer.

Payment at not less than prescribed minimum rates for sugar beets or sugarcane purchased by a producer who is also a processor.

Performance of soil-conserving practices.

A producer who has complied with the prescribed conditions is entitled to, and by right should, receive, whether he is a small grower or a large-scale producer, the payment he has thus earned under a self-supporting program. The reduction in the proceeds of sale of the raw product due to the effect of the tax makes it necessary for the agricultural producer to qualify for and receive the conditional payment in order to realize a normal return for his production.

Under the economic operation of the tax-quota-payment program the tax is taken out of the normal gross proceeds of sale of sugar and principally reduces the income of the raw producer, who then receives the remainder of his normal proceeds in the form of the conditional payment. The total proceeds—sales price and conditional payment—return to the raw producer his normal share of the aggregate income of the domestic sugar industry. As long as the tax remains in effect denial of conditional payments to any group of domestic producers, large or small, or any drastic curtailment of payments, would mean potential ruin for the producers thus deprived of an important part of their just return. The conditional payment under the sugar program is not a gratuity or a relief payment from public funds. The conditional payment is a legitimate and necessary part of the total amount received by the raw producer for his product, and he earns it by compliance with specific conditions.

Large-scale producers under the schedule of reductions incorporated in the Sugar Act receive in conditional payments considerably less than the amount contributed through the tax paid on account of the sugar they produce.

Large-scale producers certainly contribute much toward the success of the program by their compliance with its conditions. They are equitably entitled to receive the payments they have earned. Some large producers make little profit, and some make more. The same is true of small producers. Those who make large profits—and they are scarce under the sugar prices which have prevailed for the past 2 years—pay large income taxes, and this is the equitable way to deal with the situation.

Sugar production in the Territory of Hawaii has necessarily been developed upon the basis of large-scale farming. Sugar producers in Hawaii were required to make drastic reductions in areas and production in compliance with sugar-quota legislation, and they have complied with the spirit and the letter of the Sugar Act. They employ large numbers of men on a year-round basis at good wages. The wage determinations made pursuant to the Sugar Act are matters of public record, and show that the wages determined for sugarcane workers in Hawaii are higher than the wages similarly determined for any other sugarcane-producing area. The Secretary of Agriculture, in his annual report for the year 1939 (p. 108), said:

Hawaiian sugar producers have worked out a system, not found in any other domestic sugar-producing area, which makes it possible for their laborers to work the year round, while the value of the perquisites furnished these workers is relatively high.

The plantation producers in Hawaii have borne the entire reduction in production on account of the quota system, without any reduction in the areas cultivated by more than 3,000 small growers.

Under all of these circumstances sugar producers in the Territory of Hawaii who have borne every burden of compliance with the program and who have, by reason of large-scale production, qualified for payments based upon a relatively large number of units of contribution to the program, are, in all justice and equity, entitled to the payments thus earned.

The economy of Hawaii is based practically from 60 percent to 75 percent on the sugar industry. Taxes collected on the sugar produced in the Territory exceed the conditional payment disbursed to the Hawaiian producers. This difference accrues to the Federal Treasury. Together with receipts from other sources, the difference between the taxes collected and the conditional payments made is used to carry the cost of administering the Sugar Act of 1937 and to make payments to small producers, mostly in the beet-sugar areas, in excess of the taxes collected on the amount of sugar they produce. If the conditional payments were withheld, the entire economy of the Territory of Hawaii would be greatly endangered.

The "proof of the pudding is in the eating," and the argument sometimes made that the protection extended to domestic sugar producers is a subsidy borne by the consumers cannot be justified by the facts. The retail price of refined sugar, per pound, in the United States, in cents, as reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics over a period of 11 years is as follows: 1929, 6.4; 1930, 6.1; 1931, 5.9; 1932, 5; 1933, 5.3; 1934, 5.5; 1935, 5.7; 1936, 5.6; 1937, 5.6; 1938, 5.4. These figures compare favorably with the prices paid in other countries. The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has compiled the retail price of refined sugar, as of May 1, 1939, for a number of countries, as per the table below, which shows that the United States pays less for its sugar than most of the nations of the world.

Prior to 1934 the American sugar industry was not limited in its expansion except through natural economic causes. It was protected against foreign competition by the tariff, but otherwise was under no restrictions as to the quantity each unit or area might produce. On the few occasions when domestic sugar producers were unable to meet the requirements of the American market, foreign producers took advantage of the opportunity to demand exorbitant prices. The theory that foreign sugars would bring lower prices to the American consumers has never worked out in practice.

For over 100 years Hawaii has produced sugar as its principal exportable crop, and with the revenue obtained from the sale of this crop has developed a stable internal economy. In 1875 a reciprocity treaty between the United States and the then Kingdom of Hawaii encouraged the further development of the sugar industry in the islands to meet the requirements of the American market. Since annexation, when Hawaii came under the American flag, it has continued to be one of the principal sources of sugar for the American people. However, the expansion of the Hawaiian sugar industry has never displaced any other domestic producer. Other domestic areas have increased their total production and proportionate share of the American market substantially, but the following table shows that for the past 11 years Hawaii's share of the American market has varied very slightly and has averaged 14 1/4 percent of America's total consumption:

principles of this act each unit of the domestic-sugar industry was assigned a quota based on the historic record of production of that unit. Quotas were also assigned to foreign producers. To implement the act an excise tax was levied, and benefit payments to offset this tax were made to the producers who complied with the law. The purpose of the act was to stabilize the sugar industry for the benefit of all those engaged in it by requiring each producing area to reduce its potential production proportionately.

Hawaii's cooperation in this effort is fully covered in a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture dated June 19, 1936, which was published in Senate Document 274, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, which I quote in part as follows:

By the terms of the Hawaiian sugar production adjustment contract, the plantation producers agreed that they would make the necessary reduction on plantation land and not on that of the 5,002 small adherent planters who were paid a share of the benefit payments by the plantation producers. A total area of 24,238 acres of plantation sugarcane land, or 10.8 percent of the 255,077 acres of land on which cane was grown under plantation administration, was fallowed, and thereby taken out of production, in the course of reduction of the quantity of sugar produced. No reduction for the purpose of restriction of production was made in the area of 32,909 acres on which the 3,002 adherent planters grow sugarcane. During the 2 years of 1934 and 1935, the total areas of adherent planter lands which were withdrawn from sugarcane production due to various natural causes amounted to only 88 acres, or one-quarter of 1 percent.

The 39 plantation producers also agreed that they would bring about "reduction in production required by the contract in such a manner as to cause the least labor, economic, and social disturbance," and, pursuant to this agreement, they did not discharge or lay off any of the workers employed on the several plantations by reason of such reduction of production, or because of any provision of the production-adjustment contract. In addition, the contract included labor provisions which prohibited the employment of children under 14 years of age, limited labor of children between 14 and 16 years of age to 8 hours a day, and called for compliance with any minimum-wage or maximum-hour determinations by the Secretary of Agriculture. It also provided that the Secretary might adjudicate labor and contract disputes.

The plantation producers, on November 1, 1935, inaugurated a new bonus system by which the employees receive a larger share of the returns from higher prices of sugar, including for the purposes of this bonus benefit payments as part of the price of sugar. The total payments under the bonus plan for the period of 6 months—November 1935 to April 1936—is estimated at $1,101,326. It is also estimated that such bonus payments would have amounted to between $2,500,000 and $3,000,000 per annum had benefit payments been continued.

Under the 2-year crop cycle on which sugarcane is grown in the Territory of Hawaii, the reduction in production already effectuated pursuant to the contract affects the 1935, 1936, and 1937 crops to the extent of a total estimated reduction of 522,625 tons of sugar.

It will be noted that the Jones-Costigan Act required a very material curtailment of Hawaiian sugar production, which represented a very substantial sacrifice to the industry. When the Sugar Act of 1937 superseded the Jones-Costigan Act a further curtailment in Hawaiian production was required, but the new act did fix Hawaii's quota on a more equitable basis. The exhaustive hearings which preceded the passage of the Sugar Act of 1937 resulted in establishing for each producing unit a definite percentage of the American sugar market. The figure for Hawaii fixed in this act represents a serious cut in the amount which Hawaii had been producing over a period of years, and should certainly be the minimum proportion allocated to Hawaii. Any further increases or decreases of domestic production should be shared among all domestic producers in accordance with the percentages now established.

If the quota excise tax conditional payment system is to be retained as preferable to the former method of tariff protection, then certainly it must rest on an equitable basis. Every unit of the domestic-sugar industry should receive exactly equal treatment, with no preference to any specific area based on political potency or geography. Payments made to producers who have accepted the law in good faith, and who have cooperated to the fullest extent in making the quota system a success, should not be denied on any theory of discriminating between producers because of size. I hope, therefore, that the Committee will support the recommendations of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations and pass the amendment offered by the distinguished chairman of that committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is very essential and very important that we adopt this amendment, because, unless we do, the sugar producers of this country, who in some sections are now planting their crop and in other sections plowing their land and making their preparations for next year's crop, will have no way of knowing what they can depend upon for this year.

As has already been stated, these producers are going to be taxed. They are going to pay the tax, and unless we make this money available at this time they will have no assurance that at the end of the year they are going to receive the money back in the form of benefit payments. This is an important matter, because approximately one-third of the amount they will receive as revenue from their crops comes in the form of these payments.

I want to appeal especially to those on my left who are friendly to the sugar industry of this country. I know many Republicans of this House have often expressed the thought that we ought to produce in this country those things of which we have no surplus; in other words, deficit crops. Sugar is definitely a deficit crop. Here is an opportunity to assist in producing a crop of which we do not have a surplus.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Is it not a fact that we must restore the former duty on sugar in order to protect our producers or continue making these benefit payments?

Mr. HOPE. There is no question about that. If we do not make these payments we are going to ruin the sugar industry of this country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. HORTON].

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to take only a minute to say that if the Committee does not adopt the pending amendment, it will destroy the sugar industry of this country. There are those of you who remember that back during the World War No. 1 the price of sugar rose to $32 a hundred, because sugar production passed into the hands of foreign countries. We may face that condition again, and if we do, the consumer will pay many times more than the one-half cent per pound which this tax may possibly impose. The price of sugar is lower today than it has ever been in this country with the exception of 1932. Certainly this tax, which is now operating, has not increased the cost of sugar to the consumer and that has been the history from the start of this program.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORTON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Is it not a fact that all of these payments go back to the sugar producers?

Mr. HORTON. That is correct. It is a tax in the industry and is redistributed to those in the industry who need it—the men who grow the beets.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Does the gentleman know of any other State, of the 21 States in the Union that produce sugar beets and sugar cane, opposing this, with the exception of Florida?

Mr. HORTON. I do not. Florida makes the statement, as I understand it, that she can compete with any offshore country in the production of sugar. If that is so, then they must have lower wages and lower living conditions than the rest of the States. My State cannot pay a 30- to 40-percent increase in cost of production without a redistribution of this tax within the industry.

Mr. COOLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. Is it not a fact this tax was imposed and predicated upon the idea that the money would be refunded to the producers?

Mr. HORTON. That is correct; yes.

Mr. COOLEY. Would it be fair to retain that tax in the Treasury?

Mr. HORTON. Absolutely not. Such procedure would be breaking faith with the grower. If this tax continues to be collected and it will be, it must be, returned to the industry which pays it for the benefit of that industry. By virtue of this tax the Government is at least $20,000,000 ahead of the game. The tax yields about $68,000,000 and the payments amount to about $48,000,000. As a matter of fact the entire tax should be returned for redistribution within the industry for the very good reason that the industry pays all of the tax.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I cannot conceive how our friends from Florida can fight so bitterly against the pending amendment. It is just and right that sugar-beet growers should have this money. It was collected for what purpose? To pay this bounty to sugar-beet growers. After the Supreme Court decision of January 1936 we could not levy a processing tax, so this method was adopted. In California farmers have planted their beets in good faith, believing they would get this bounty, and they are soon ready to plant in the country to the north. They are paying the wages which the Government expects them to pay. They are living up to their part of the agreement. The money has been collected. It is in the National Treasury. I ask our friends from Florida by what right do you want to confiscate this money that was clearly destined for the sugar-beet growers? You could not do a more unjust act in your life than to kill this honest amendment which has been offered by the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Sugar Act of 1937, Public No. 414 of the Seventy-fifth Congress, specifically imposed an excise tax on the manufacture of sugar of approximately 53 cents per hundred pounds. The same act under the additional payments to farmers provides that the benefit payments shall go to the farmer on the basis of 60 cents per hundred pounds for the recoverable sugar in the beet or the sugarcane which the farmer delivers to the factory.

I hold in my hand a sugar-beet contract which runs between the factory and the grower. While the tax is imposed on the factory at point of processing, the contract between the factory and the grower provides that the farmer shall bear his share of all taxes whatsoever imposed upon the processing, production, ownership, handling, possession, or sale of sugar which is hereafter imposed by the United States or any governmental agency or authority. At a later date I shall submit to the House information relative to the retail price of sugar to the consumer before the application of the tax and since it began to operate. Those interested will find that the retail price has not been increased by the amount of the tax imposed. A careful analysis of the situation will support the contention that the tax has been absorbed by the industry, and this is in line with the contentions made by the President at the time he recommended the sugar legislation of 1937. In view of the fact the tax is being imposed on the industry, the money is going into the United States Treasury, and the farmer-growers are bearing their share of the tax burden, I contend that this appropriation should be made. I congratulate the Chairman of the Committee in reaching his decision to offer the amendment restoring the appropriation to the bill and I hope the amendment will be accepted.

Here is a clean-cut case where the tax comes specifically from the industry. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I presume I am the one member on the Agricultural Appropriations Subcommittee who is really opposed to the restoration of this item in the bill. I am opposed to it, first of all, because I am opposed to the Sugar Act of 1937. I am opposed to an act that will give 30 out of every 100 pounds of sugar consumed in the United States to the Cubans, where they can put babies in perambulators in the fields, if they like, and violate all the provisions of the 1937 act that are imposed on the domestic producer.

Secondly, I am against it because Dr. Bernhardt, the chief of the sugar section, when he came before the committee on December 11, had this to say, and it appears at page 83 of the hearings:

It is the intention, as I understand it, of the Congressmen representing certain sugar areas to bring up new legislation. Just the other day in California the National Beet Growers Association adopted certain resolutions requesting Congress to take early action for new sugar legislation. In the event that legislation should become effective, either by joint resolution or in the form of other legislation, then payments under the new act would be required.

If there is to be new legislation in this Congress, and this is the chief of the sugar section speaking, then why restore this item now? Why not wait until we get a look at it? Why not wait until we look at the amendments? Since there is money enough to pay up to the 1st of July, you are not doing anything effective with this amendment. That is the best answer I know of, to wait until this new legislation comes along in this Congress, and then we can reevaluate this whole Sugar Act and see what the Congress ought to do.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The reason we are proposing new legislation is that the new legislation will go into effect when the present act expires at the end of 1940.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; this act expires in December of 1940, and there is no hurry about including this item in the bill. We will then get a real act for the Sugar Act of 1940. [Applause.]

Recently I took a gentleman from my State to see the Secretary of Agriculture about a check for sugar benefits which had been withheld because of an alleged infraction of the Sugar Act. The Secretary was very kindly and sympathetic and even expressed the belief that the facts which were presented warranted some modification of a labor provision in the existing law. It was this experience which directed my attention to the Sugar Act of 1937, and since that time I have made a considerable examination of the matter.

First, I find that the act authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to determine the sugar requirements of this country for the year ahead. In round figures this amounts to about 6,800,000 tons.

Secondly, he is empowered to apportion marketings and importation as between domestic and foreign areas. This is done under a formula in the law whereby about 55 percent of our sugar consumption is allotted to domestic areas and 45 percent to foreign countries. These two divisions are in turn further divided among domestic beet, mainland cane, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Cuba, Philippines, and other sugar areas.

The net effect of this formula is to give our own beet growers about 23 percent of the market while Louisiana gets about 5½ percent, Florida less than 1 percent, while Cuba is given nearly 29 percent of the American market.

Now the Sugar Act of 1937 provides that if our growers comply with the quotas, they will be entitled to conditional benefit payments.

As a condition for these payments, they must not hire child labor under 14. They must pay fair and reasonable wages as determined by the Secretary. They must not market in excess of their allotted share and they must follow certain soil-fertility practices. It is manifest that the Sugar Act is, therefore, the perfect example of complete regimentation.

Funds with which to make benefit payments are obtained by a tax on the manufacturer and the importation of sugar, which tax will run roughly about one-half cent per pound.

Now, the amazing thing about this whole act is that it gives Cuba nearly 30 percent of the American market. Cuban producers may employ child labor and fail to comply with other provisions of the act except as to quotas and yet retain a market of almost 30 pounds out of every 100 pounds of the sugar consumed in the United States. Our own producers must strictly comply with the provisions laid down by the Secretary of Agriculture, but Cuba may ignore these with impunity and still retain the big end of the American market.

How does his whole program square away with the oft-repeated argument that the American market should be kept for the American farmers?

Further than this, we are giving Cuba a huge gratuity in the form of a lowered tariff, which, in aggregate amount, is probably more than the value of the goods which we sell to Cuba under the provisions of the reciprocal-trade treaties.

By the Tariff Act of 1930 the duty on Cuban sugar was 2½ cents per pound less 20 percent by the terms of reciprocity arrangement. In May of 1934 this duty was reduced to 1½ cents per pound. Later, under the trade agreement with Cuba, it was reduced to 90 cents per hundred, or less than 1 cent per pound.

Now, let us take 1935 for an example. We sold to Cuba about $60,000,000 worth of merchandise. In return for that we lost duties of $40,000,000 and in addition paid $1.19 per hundred over the world price for Cuban sugar. This excess price accounts for another $43,000,000, so that in reality we paid $83,000,000 for the glorious privilege of selling Cuba $60,000,000 worth of goods.

Frankly, I do not understand the logic of this arrangement under which we set out to restrict the production of sugar in our own country and hand 30 percent of our market to Cuba in such form that it amounts to an irrevocable gift under the act of 1937.

This is one reason why I favored striking the whole sugar section from the pending appropriation bill until such time as the Congress could make a meticulous examination of the whole sugar situation and revamp it in the interest of the American farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I am really surprised at the statements that are made at times regarding sugar. Someone said that this would cost the taxpayers $300,000,000. Just what has been the price of sugar since this law went into effect? In 1935 the price was $4.85; the next year, $4.69; the next year, $4.72; and the next, $4.481, or about $4.50 per hundred. Why, if you took off all of it except the tariff it would not cost you that much.

A gentleman made the remark today that sugar was high in the United States. What is the truth about it? Here is a chart showing 27 of the leading nations of the world. Here is the United States. Italy starts down here with a little over 15 cents. Then there are those up here over 10 cents. These are over 15. When you get up to the United States it is about 5. But you can buy sugar in Washington today for $4.75 a hundred. If you notice the nations above this red line, they are all what I term "brechclout nations," except two, and by brechclout nations I mean nations that grow sugar in the Tropics, and it is crazy to talk about competing with them.

This gentleman wanted to know why we wanted this money now. You have to have it to pay for the beets that are going to be planted in 1940 and grown in 1940. This law will leave in the Treasury over $18,000,000, besides paying for it.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KLEBERG. I should like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Colorado if the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] was not a recommendation, in fact, that the Government of the United States go back on its commitment with reference to meeting its obligations under the act accepted by both Houses.

Mr. CUMMINGS. You would just be stealing 60 cents a hundred from every man that grows sugar. As I said, this leaves money in the Treasury. I do not believe this Congress is going to vote to do anything of that kind. The trouble with those people down in Florida, who are the only ones opposing it, is that they want to grow all the sugar they want. What is the truth about sugar? The people that grow sugar in the United States last year grew over 8,000,000 tons of sugar and we used 6,500,000 tons. If it were not for the quota, Florida would not be growing any sugar. In 1933 the people who grew 90 percent of the sugar in the United States met in convention and adopted a quota. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, this sugar situation comes nearer a national disgrace than any one thing I know. The gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KING] spoke a few moments ago and I want to call your attention to a release of the Department of Agriculture in which it is shown that individual companies in Hawaii received in benefit payments enormous sums of money. Let me read the list furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture:

Similar payments were made to American producers. And let no one tell you the producers pay the processing tax from which these enormous subsidies are taken. Those taxes are paid by the consumers of this country. Listen to a portion of what Secretary Wallace wrote Senator PRENTISS BROWN April 6, 1938:

I know that you will also appreciate the difficulty from the standpoint of the public interest in finding adequate justification for a policy of charging American consumers higher prices for sugar. In my letter to Senator Bulkley, referred to above, attention was called to the fact that "it is estimated that at current prices American consumers are obliged to pay more than $350,000,000 per annum in excess of the value, at world prices, of their annual sugar supply (without allowance for the estimated net revenue of approximately $47,000,000 represented by the difference between disbursements under the Sugar Act of 1937 and receipts from the tariff and the 50-cent tax on sugar, or for the possible increase in world price that might result from changed conditions). This is equivalent to a tax of approximately $2.70 per capita on a population of 129,000,000 persons. It means on the average a levy of more than $10 per family, including that one-third of the Nation which is ill nourished, and it represents an amount of purchasing power equal to more than 50 quarts of milk and 50 loaves of bread for each family in the United States."

That is the Secretary of Agriculture speaking, and think of those who are poorly fed and ill-clad when you vote on this question. Evidence, if any is needed, is that in August 1937 the sugar price was 4.06. The Sugar Act became effective September 1 of that year and the sugar price immediately went to 4.996. Actual, pertinent, immediate evidence that the people of this country are paying a tremendous and unjust subsidy to sugar planters.

Of course, Florida is opposed to it. We do not want a subsidy. We want an opportunity to grow sugar and sell it to the American people. That is all we want and that is all we need, and we do not like the thought of being made victims of the present vicious system. I sincerely hope the House will stand with the full Committee on Appropriations and the recommendation it brought here. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the chairman of the committee in proposing this amendment and giving the Congress the right here to carry out a commitment of the Federal Government. It is the processors who pay this tax. It goes to the producers. They are entitled to it. In my State we raise about 85,000 acres of sugar beets and if we did not get these benefit payments, our sugar-beet producers would have to quit and our sugar factories would have to close down, and then you would have to appropriate money to take care of a greater relief roll than you are taking care of now. I hope you support the amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PETERSON of Florida) there were—ayes 85, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

International production control committees.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] a question.

I appreciate the gentleman's desire not to meet tomorrow and the desire of a number of the other Members, but this bill will probably not be passed in the Senate for a great many weeks and I am wondering why, in view of the fact we have already passed several of the appropriation bills, we should not adjourn over until Monday and take the rest of this bill up for consideration at that time. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this bill has ordinarily passed in 3 days.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This is an extraordinary cut.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Continuing through the fourth day is unusual, but in order to give the most liberal debate and recognize everyone, both in general debate and under the 5-minute rule, consumed a rather unprecedented amount of time. The schoolmaster tells us we must complete the bill this week. If we do not finish tonight we will have to finish tomorrow, and those who have discussed the matter with the committee would rather stay tonight than come back tomorrow.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not talking about coming back tomorrow. I am talking about going over until Monday to finish the bill. Will not the schoolmaster permit us to have a vacation on Saturday—that is usual in schools?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes; but we do our chores.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Now, seriously, there is not anything pressing for Monday or Tuesday, for that matter.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We took a plebiscite on the question when the motion to rise was voted on. The majority in favoring of staying was so overwhelming I would hesitate to broach the subject again at this time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not trying to delay matters. I am perfectly willing to trust the judgment of this House, but the Members are tired and there is no reason for crowding this matter tonight that I can see. Why not wait until Monday or Tuesday or whenever it is convenient to take it up? We can finish it in 2 or 3 hours, and that seems to make sense to me. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is immaterial to me, of course, until otherwise directed. I must follow the instructions of the House.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Well, we have worked hard here all week, and there has not been any filibustering.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Down in Texas when it is necessary to get the harvest in, I do not think they quit at half past 6 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman from Missouri is always willing to work.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Was the regular order demanded, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask the floor leader and I ask the Speaker if they are not willing to have this bill go over.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. There is an orderly way of reaching this. A motion to rise would be in order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman this question: If I move that the Committee rise, will the gentleman agree that he will make no objection to our adjourning over until Monday when we adjourn?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement. The regular order has been demanded from all points. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is properly on the floor, recognized by the Chair on a motion to strike out the last word. On that recognition the gentleman has the floor and his time has not yet expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Texas has yielded to me and I do not yield for a point of order.

I have this problem with every committee in this House. When the Committee on Agriculture comes before the House with a bill I am supposed to stand by the committee. When the Committee on the Judiciary or any other committee of the House comes in with a bill, the leader is supposed to stand by the committee. I have talked to the members of this committee on both sides of the aisle and they are unanimous in wanting to go ahead and fulfill the program. We have a program for next week. I am charged with the responsibility of fixing the programs for the week and trying to see that they are carried out. Now, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has said, we have devoted one more day to this bill than is usual on a bill of this sort. I do not see any reason why we could not sit here for an hour or an hour and a half longer and pass this bill tonight.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the Committee rises, will the gentleman offer any objection to preferring a unanimous-consent request to adjourn over until Monday?

Mr. RAYBURN. That would be objected to. I know it would be objected to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Even if we would agree to meet at 11 o'clock?

Mr. RAYBURN. At any time. I am sure that a motion to put this bill over until Monday would be objected to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Of course the House could adjourn again tomorrow. I am not trying to delay the matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. The House can do anything it wants to, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am sure the gentleman will agree that I have not tried to filibuster.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no; of course not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think that when a bill is cut in two, the parties are entitled to a hearing when they are not driven into a pocket.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the fiscal year 1941 the Secretary of Agriculture may expend not to exceed $17,500 from the funds available to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for the share of the United States as a member of the International Wheat Advisory Committee, the International Sugar Council, or like events or bodies concerned with the reduction of agricultural surpluses or with other objectives of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, together with traveling and other necessary expenses relating thereto.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLS) there were—ayes 60, noes 104.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it has been my plan and intention to offer at this time, and at this point in the bill, the following amendment:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make parity payments to producers of wheat, cotton, corn (in the commercial corn-producing area), rice, and tobacco, pursuant to the provisions of section 303 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, $607,000,000, which sum shall be apportioned to these commodities in proportion to the amount by which each fails to reach the parity income.

Yesterday morning I gave notice in this House of my intention to offer an amendment to include in this bill an appropriation for parity payments to the farmers of this Nation. Since then I have been approached by a great many Members of the House, particularly by members of the Appropriations Committee and those in positions of leadership, and they have all advised against offering such amendment at this time. They include the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill, the individual members of the subcommittee, the majority and minority leaders of the House, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. Most, if not all, of these appear to be interested in securing an appropriation for parity payments at the present session of Congress. They say they are, but they all advise me that this is not the time and place to make the fight. These leaders whose good faith I accept and whose positions of influence I respect, say that inasmuch as neither the subcommittee nor the full Committee on Appropriations recommended any amount for parity, inasmuch as the present sentiment of the House membership appears to be opposed to any item which was not recommended by the President in his Budget message, and parity payments were not so recommended, and inasmuch as unfavorable action here today might reduce the chances of having a parity-payment amendment agreed upon later in the session, they feel that it would be unwise for my amendment to be proposed. They go so far as to say that in their best judgment I would hurt rather than help the cause by offering my amendment and might contribute to the ultimate defeat of our efforts to secure funds to insure our farmers 100-percent parity.

Naturally, considering its source, I cannot disregard or lightly pass over this advice and these requests. Of course, I regret that they have taken this course. Instead of this attitude, I wish they could have rallied behind my amendment and helped me secure its adoption. Practically every Member of this House has either declared himself in favor of parity for the farmers of this Nation or has recognized its fairness and justice.

The last thing I want to do is to hurt or retard the final results of our efforts to get funds to pay 100-percent parity. These leaders and advisers seem to think I would by offering this amendment. I certainly do not know it all, I am a comparatively new Member of this body, and, with the greatest reluctance, I am yielding to the counsel of age and experience, and am, therefore, withholding my amendment.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition at this time merely for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the House the great advantage and benefit that the tobacco farmers of this country received last year from funds which we had made available to the Commodity Credit Corporation and to express the hope that the permanent appropriation for the Commodity Credit Corporation will be supplemented in line with the recommendations of the Budget.

The tobacco farmers were the first casualties of the European conflict. In the midst of marketing our last year's tobacco the British buyers withdrew from the market. Our warehouses were closed, sales were stopped, and business in all eastern North Carolina was completely paralyzed. British buyers usually purchase approximately 35 percent of the flue-cured tobacco crop and when they withdrew from the market it was perfectly apparent that the flue-cured tobacco farmers were facing immediate financial disaster. Fortunately, we had provided the machinery and the funds necessary to afford relief in this great emergency. No new legislation was needed. Money was available. At the time the British buyers withdrew from the market they had purchased approximately one-third of their normal requirements. The Commodity Credit Corporation and the officials of the Department of Agriculture, appreciating the importance of the acute situation, entered into agreements with British buyers under which the buyers returned to the market and continued to purchase their usual requirements, thus preventing a complete collapse of prices. Under these agreements the Commodity Credit Corporation provided $38,000,000, taking title to the tobacco purchased and holding it under an option which was by the agreements given to the British buyers, which they may exercise at any time between now and July 1, 1941.

Our situation is now aggravated by the imposition of an embargo by the British Government upon American-grown tobacco. If the embargo is not lifted and our tobacco is not permitted to enter the United Kingdom there is grave uncertainty as to whether or not British companies will be interested in making in 1940 agreements with the Commodity Credit Corporation similar to the agreements of 1939. If the Commodity Credit Corporation is handicapped on account of a lack of sufficient funds it is plain to see that bankruptcy and distress will envelop those of us who live in the tobacco country.

Although a point of order prevented the appropriation of the amount recommended by the Budget for the disposal of surplus products and for other purposes for which the Commodity Credit Corporation was created, I desire to express an earnest hope that some way may be found in the Senate to provide sufficient funds, for unless sufficient funds are available the Federal Government will not be able to aid the large group of citizens engaged in the production of the one farm commodity upon which the Government annually collects an enormous amount of revenue. [Applause.]

(By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.)

The Clerk read as follows:

Administrative and operating expenses: For operating and administrative expenses under the Federal Crop Insurance Act, approved February 16, 1938, as amended (7 U. S. C. 1501-1518), $5,523,200, together with a reappropriation of not to exceed $100,000 of the unexpended balance of the funds available for this purpose for the fiscal year 1940, to be allotted by the Secretary of Agriculture (a) to the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, as authorized by section 516 (a) of such Act, and (b) to bureaus and offices of the Department of Agriculture or for transfer to other agencies of State and Federal Governments, as authorized by section 507 (d) of such Act; and such parts as the Secretary allots under clause (b) hereof shall be available for the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, rent in the District of Columbia, purchase of lawbooks, books of reference, periodicals, and newspapers.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON of Missouri: Page 80, line 2, strike out "$5,523,200" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,423,200".

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered to correct a typographical error. The amount agreed upon by the committee was the amount indicated in the amendment but through a typographical error the "4" was changed to a "5."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 80, after line 15, insert a caption and a new paragraph as follows:

"FARM TENANCY

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of title I of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act approved July 22, 1937 (7 U. S. C. 1000-1006), including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia, and elsewhere, exclusive of printing and binding, as authorized by said act, $25,000,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made in said act for the fiscal year 1940."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 3 additional minutes, making 8 minutes in all.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, perhaps the Members of the Committee would like to reach some agreement as to time. This is possibly the last controversial item in the bill, and if there could be some agreement as to time it would give us all a better idea of when we might hope to get away. If the gentleman will permit, we might reach some agreement as to time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What time does the gentleman think we should have?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Various suggestions have been made ranging from 20 minutes to an hour. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It depends a good deal on how much fight is going to be made on the amendment. I would like the debate to run a few minutes, and then have an agreement.

I do not want to impose on the good will of the Committee, but I am more interested in this legislation than any I have ever handled in my service in the Congress. I do not want to be disagreeable, but I think it is our most important, our No. 1 national problem, probably.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. What would the gentleman say by way of suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would rather that we let the debate run on a little while and then perhaps agree on 30 minutes a side after we have run a little while.

The regular order was demanded.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the Committee must object, unless we can reach some agreement as to time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, let me say I have no objection to the gentleman from Texas having more time if he wants it, and as much as he requires, but we ought to reach some general agreement as to the time to be consumed on this amendment to permit Members to make their arrangements.

I repeat that I have no objection to the gentleman having all the time he wants.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman will allow me to have 10 minutes and then have 30 minutes a side in addition to that, I would not object.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman to take 10 minutes and I to take 10 minutes, and that 30 minutes a side. Is that agreeable?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, that is not agreeable to me. I want to register my objection to that.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] may be permitted to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is supposed to have the floor, but it appears that five or six other Members have the floor. I do not think he yielded for the unanimous-consent request; therefore I object.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have handled many bills in the House, involving many questions. But I am impressed with the thought that this amendment undertakes to make provision for the most important measure which it has ever been my privilege to support.

The advantages of a home-owning citizenship cannot be overestimated. In the breast of practically every American citizen is the longing for a home. That sentiment is the key to patriotism and the basis of our hope for national stability. No one denies this fact.

The program has been assaulted on two grounds: First, that there is no use to try to encourage home ownership until better prices prevail for farm commodities. In other words, since some of the farmers cannot make a go of it, why encourage others to try? Second, that the amount is not sufficient to solve the entire problem and therefore should not be undertaken.
